OF THE

VOLUME XLIII, PART III.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

SIXTIETH CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

sworn statement, giving a list of his creditors and other particulars. That appears to me to be going rather far, and yet this amendment goes that far.

Now, as to amendment No. 10, I think that is going a long ways. That amendment takes away entirely the question of evil intention. Let me read the entire paragraph as amended:

If a bankrupt shall have given a preference and the person receiving it, or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, shall have had reasonable cause to believe—

Now comes the new matter—

at the time of the entry of the judgment or at the time of the recording or registering of the transfer, where such preference is evidenced by a transfer the recording or registering of which is required, that the enforcement of such judgment or transfer would effect a preference, it shall be voidable by the trustee and he may recover the property or its value from such person—for the purpose of this provision such transfer, where recording or registering is so required, shall not be deemed complete until the date of such recording or registering. And for the purpose of such recovery any court of bankruptcy, as hereinbefore defined, and any state court which would have had jurisdiction if bankruptcy had not intervened, shall have concurrent jurisdiction.

Then, again, new matter—

Recollect that this relates back four months. Recollect that the purpose is to tear up entirely transactions that are altogether honest, that are altogether in the regular course of business; such transactions precisely as men have to engage in in their ordinary everyday business. There is left in this no single hint of intention to do wrong, no element of fraud, and we are just put down to the proposition——

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it not true that the change is simply to eliminate the intention of the debtor, and that in this case the creditor will have to have cause to believe that he was being preferred? The gentleman has stated that the intent is eliminated. The only intent eliminated is that of the debtor. If the creditor has cause to believe that he is being preferred, why should he have that right, over and against other creditors?

Mr. DE ARMOND. How can any creditor make any arrangement with any debtor by which he gets anything, without having reasonable cause to believe that he is getting a preference over some other creditor, less vigilant, who has not secured his rights or protection for them? It eliminates entirely the whole question of intent. Now, why should not a man recover a judgment? Why should he not take a mortgage? Why should he not secure a debt? A judgment itself is a preference. Any man knows, when he gets a judgment, that he has a preference over a man who does not get a judgment. According to this, he ought not to obtain a judgment upon an indebtedness unless everybody else gets a judgment. He ought not to take any steps that anybody else, who is a creditor, refrains from taking. It seems to me it illustrates what perhaps unconsciously is the bottom purpose of this—to make it harder and harder for everybody, except the men gathered about the court and the men who choose to use the extraordinary power which it is proposed here to increase, to get anything out of this. I do not think that is necessary at all. It seems to me that the law is drastic enough in his particular as it stands.

Now, the intention to give preference to one creditor over another, as the law now stands, is regarded as such an act as subjects the parties to it to a vacating of what they may have done. But there may be no intention to give a preference; and yet, if by looking back over four months, through disclosures made during four months, through disclosures made in the bankruptcy court, somebody concludes that a man has reasonable ground for supposing that he gets a preference, then all of it goes to the wind.

That is all I care to say about it, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia addressed the House. See Appendix].

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAIG. Will there be any opportunity to offer an amendment to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not answer that question.

Mr. CRAIG. Then I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to give me five minutes to propose an amendment and explain it.

Mr. TIRRELL. I can not consent to that. All the time I have remaining I have yielded to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit an observation or two in relation to the eighth amendment, which I apprehend has been put in with a good purpose, but which it is evident to me from some experience is not going to work at all as intended.

It relates to the fees of receivers, and I assume that the object was to reduce the fees of receivers. As framed, the provision is simply a reward for lack of diligence, or rather a deprivation of all incentive for activity.

I have been receiver of a bankrupt some four or five times, and, as I read this bill, in most of these cases, in those cases of which I am most proud from a professional standpoint, I would have received no fee whatever, because it was always my aim to call the creditors together and wind up the estate speedily without the election of a trustee by composition or agreement, and in every case except one I have been successful in that regard. Under this proposed amendment I would not have received, nor would any receiver similarly situated, one single cent.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman is mistaken, because one provision says he shall be paid on the value of the property turned over to the trustee.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes; and in none of the cases I mention was a trustee elected. What was the use of burdening the estate with the additional commission of a trustee?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman understands that composition can not be had until after adjudication in bankruptcy under existing law, and therefore you could not have wound up the estate without a trustee.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman from New York will inform the gentleman from Kentucky that he has a distinct recollection, personally, of having done just that thing at least four times, so that the estate did not pay trustee's fees. It can be done by agreement and an order of the court, and in none of these cases, resulting in settlements of estate within three or four months and the payments to creditors of from 25 to 80 cents on the dollar, would the receiver have gotten one single cent if this bill had been in force. I am just informed by a colleague that in what is practically the largest receivership ever created in the southern district of New York there probably never will be a trusteeship. Of course in that particular case this law does not affect it, because that receivership started before the proposed law, if it becomes a law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TIRRELL. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. TIRRELL. I yield one minute more to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BENNET of New York. What will result from this statute if it becomes a law is that you will simply put temptation in the way of receivers to do one of two things, either simply to sit still and not attempt to collect in the estates, because it would not be worth their while, or to make an outside agreement with the attorneys for the receivers, whose compensation is in no wise restricted under this bill, by which they will consent to a large attorney's fee on the understanding that there will be a division with the receiver. I think that the whole eighth amendment ought to be redrafted in the interest of just administration of bankrupt estates, and I thoroughly agree with the anonymous friend who has put these pamphlets on our desks when he says that the clause is not by any means ideal. I think it is far from ideal and ought to be reconstructed.

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes.

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. Would it not obviate the trouble if, instead of the language "turned over to the trustee," we use the language "turned over under the order of the court?"

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes.

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. A receiver acts under the court's order and that would settle it.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will offer that amendment if I can be recognized.

Mr. TIRRELL. I can not consent to that.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] whose bill it is does not object.

Mr. TIRRELL. Those are merely verbal matters.

Mr. BENNET of New York. To strike out the words "to the trustee"——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BENNET of New York. If I could gain recognition for the purpose, I should also offer the following as a new section:

Amend section 29, subdivision b, so as to read as follows:

b. A person shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not to exceed two years upon conviction of the offense of having knowingly and fraudulently (1) concealed from the receiver or trustee of an estate in bankruptcy any of the property belonging to such estate in bankruptcy; or (2) made a false oath or account in, or in relation to, any proceeding in bankruptcy; (3) presented under oath any false claim for proof against the estate of a bankrupt, or used any such claim in composition, personally or by agent, proxy, or attorney, or as agent, proxy, or attorney; or (4) received any material amount of property from a bankrupt after the filing of the petition, with intent to defeat this act; or (5) extorted or attempted to extort any money or property from any person as a consideration for acting or forbearing to act in bankruptcy proceedings.

It is drafted by an able member of the bankruptcy bar, who writes as follows:

LAW OFFICES
COHEN, CREEVEY & RICHTER,
New York, January 27, 1909.

Hon. WILLIAM S. BENNET,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BENNET: I have received, through your courtesy, copies of the proposed amendments to the bankruptcy law, together with copies of the majority and minority reports.

I do not find in either the amendments or the reports any reference to a situation concerning which there has appeared, from time to time, considerable criticism of the bankruptcy law. As you will doubtless recall, I was designated as special United States attorney to prosecute certain fraudulent bankrupts. The results of these prosecutions are to be found in the case of United States v. Richard Cohen et al. (19 American Bankruptcy Reports, p. 8); see also case below, Fifteenth American Bankruptcy Reports, page 357. I especially call your attention to the comment of the New York Law Journal upon the present defects in the bankruptcy law reported in Note 1, Fifteenth American Bankruptcy Reports, page 357.

The reason for the complicated proof in the case of United States v. Richard Cohen was because one of the defendants, Simpson, was president of the corporation. He was, indeed, the corporation itself, and the corporation was under his control. One of the circuit courts had held that under our bankruptcy law an officer of a corporation could not be guilty of concealing assets from the trustee in bankruptcy of the corporation. (U. S. v. Fields, 14 American Bankruptcy Reports, 507; 137 Fed. Rep., 6; U. S. v. Lake, 12 American Bankruptcy Reports, 270; 129 Fed. Rep., 499.)

It was our contention in United States v. Cohen that these two decisions were wrong; that applying the definitions at the beginning of the bankruptcy act, Congress indicated clearly its intent in the penal provisions of the statutes to reach corporate offenders through its officers. You will note, however, that in the decision in United States v. Richard Cohen by the circuit court of appeals, the court fails to meet or pass upon this point. (See 19 A. B. R., pp. 10 and 11.) The practical result of this situation, according to the decisions, is, therefore, that unless a conspiracy indictment can be sustained any fraudulent bankrupt can organize himself and his relatives into a corporation, retain control of the corporation and conceal, with immunity, all the assets of the corporation from the trustee in bankruptcy. Unless he shall have conspired prior to the bankruptcy proceedings to carry out such a scheme with other persons, and unless the evidence establishing this fact is available, he goes scot free. In this respect the recent decision of Judge Sanborn, of the circuit court of appeals, makes the problem of prosecution still more difficult. He holds that there must be absolute proof of conspiracy to conceal assets from a trustee in bankruptcy and that conspiracy to conceal assets generally, followed by an actual concealment from the trustee in bankruptcy, is not sufficient. (See United States v. Grodson, 21 A. B. R., 68.)

I call your attention also to another defect in the law. Unless a bankrupt conceals his assets from the trustee, he commits no crime. He may conceal as much as he pleases from the receiver in bankruptcy, and he may dissipate these assets, so that by the time the trustee is elected he no longer can be said to "conceal" from the trustee. Inasmuch as concealment from a receiver is not declared a crime in the statute, he, too, goes scot-free.

These are some of the reasons why the bankruptcy law has proved inadequate to meet fraudulent practices. I think I may speak with some authority on this subject, inasmuch as I have had now in my office prosecutions against ten fraudulent bankrupts and have secured convictions in each instance, eight of the offenders having served or now serving jail sentences.

If you think there is any likelihood of your securing amendments to the law that will meet these points, I shall be very glad to draft the necessary changes.

Very sincerely, yours, JULIUS HENRY COHEN.

The following calls attention to another omission in the bill:

FREDERICK KLEIN,
COUNSELOR AT LAW,
235 Broadway, New York, January 14, 1909.

MY DEAR MR. BENNET: I just noticed in an editorial of the New York Times to the effect that there is now pending in Congress a bill for the purpose of modifying in some respects the present bankruptcy act.

I had my attention called to a question which does not seem to be determined, but which, to my mind, ought to be made plain by the act itself. There is a question as to whether a bankrupt is relieved from his obligation under a lease which has not expired at the time of his adjudication. Some authorities seem to hold that a man can not be discharged from installments due under a lease which did not accrue up to the time of his adjudication. On the other hand, I have run across authorities which hold that a lease is not a more sacred obligation than any other debt, but it seems to me the bankruptcy act should make this point plain, one way or the other.

I write this letter to you hoping that you will bring this point to the attention of the proper committee, as I think it is a matter which should receive attention by Congress.

Very respectfully, yours, FREDERICK KLEIN.

Hon. WILLIAM S. BENNET,
Washington, D. C., care House of Representatives.

Mr. TIRRELL. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman how many times can an individual take advantage of the bankruptcy law under the proposed amendment?

Mr. TIRRELL. Once in six years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Under the proposed law?

Mr. TIRRELL. It does not change the time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Once in six years?

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should have a bankruptcy law for any and all times. We passed the existing law to relieve conditions that arose as a result of the panic of 1893. The law was passed and was intended to relieve that condition. That condition has been relieved, and I do not think that we should have a law that, in effect, daily invites a man to make a debt knowing that he can go and take advantage of the bankruptcy law and get rid of it. I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say this to the gentleman in charge of the bill: It was my understanding, and it was the understanding of scores of gentlemen on this side of the House, when this order was obtained the other day, that we were to have a separate vote on each substantive proposition involved in this bill. If the gentleman insists on calling the previous question, ten distinct and separate propositions will be put up to each Member of this House at one time, and while there are some of us, and I am one of them, who favor seven or eight or nine of the amendments, still there are one or two amendments that we do not like, and it looks to me, in a case like this, where each amendment raises a separate question, that there ought to be a separate vote on that question.

Now, that can not be done under the rules of the House, unless the gentleman will consent that this bill be considered by sections in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House; and I ask unanimous consent, and I hope, in the interest of good faith and fair dealing in this House, that no gentleman will object to it, that we consider each proposition in the bill separately, and that the gentleman will not attempt to force down this bill en bloc on some of us who are in favor of most of it, but opposed to some one or two sections of it. [Applause.] Just one sentence, Mr. Speaker, before I finish. There is not any opposition, except to one or two of these sections. It will not take fifteen or twenty minutes to divide the question, and I do think the gentleman ought to be willing to do that; but if he is opposed to that, I hope that he will at least give us unanimous consent to vote on section 10 separately. Mr. Speaker, I submit the request for unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House—that is, by sections.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. TIRRELL. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we have a separate vote on section 10.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for a separate vote on section 10.

Mr. TIRRELL. I object, Mr. Speaker. I will state in the few minutes I have left why I object. There were amendments proposed which I was in favor of. There were scores of amendments proposed to the bankruptcy law, some of which I would like to have seen incorporated in it, but when we got together—Democrats and Republicans on the committee—and discussed this matter, the Republican members waived some things and the Democratic members waived other things, and we united on this bill——

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes.

Mr. CLAYTON. As I understand from the gentleman's remarks, the gentleman thinks that the bankruptcy law needs scores and scores of amendments to make it a good law?

Mr. TIRRELL. I can not answer that question now; but I have to say that this was a compromise of the best features proposed in the amendments by both sides of this House. We agreed upon these amendments in the subcommittee composed of both sides of this House, and having done that, I am going to stick to our plan with regard to the matter and endeavor to get this bill through——

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman think it is right to get it through in this way and tie our hands and not give us a vote on even one separate amendment?

Mr. TIRRELL. I certainly do, under the circumstances under which this bill was formulated.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, very well, the gentleman is entitled to his view.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell us how attorneys' fees are fixed under this law?

Mr. TIRRELL. A certain percentage—very small.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is that to be taken as part of the receivers' compensation, or does he get so much and pay the lawyer or the lawyer on the outside get so much in addition?

Mr. TIRRELL. The receiver is cut down under this bill from robbing the creditors.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How about the lawyer?

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on this bill and all amendments thereto to its final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Are we entitled to a separate vote upon each one of these amendments?

The SPEAKER. Oh, yes; under the rule.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Then I demand a separate vote——

The SPEAKER. The time has not arrived for that.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. I want to make that demand when the time does arrive.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I desire to know, if the previous question is voted down, if that will give opportunity to amend the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia knows undoubtedly as well as the Chair that if the previous question is voted down the bill is open to amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HARDWICK) there were—ayes 78, noes 60.

Mr. HENRY of Texas and Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members. As many as favor ordering the previous question will, as their names are called, answer "yea," as many as are opposed will answer "nay," those present and not voting will answer "present," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 149, nays 98, answered "present" 7, not voting 132, as follows:

The resolution (S. Res. 283) was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the special message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the National Conservation Commission, with accompanying papers, be printed in full as a document, taking No. 676 of the present Congress, the number of the document containing the special message of the President transmitting this report.

DISTRIBUTION OF COURT REPORTS.

Mr. KNOX. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 7808) to provide for the distribution of the reports of the United States circuit courts of appeals and of the United States circuit and district courts to certain officers of the United States, and for other purposes, to report it favorably with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and I submit a report (No. 936) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to procure complete sets of the Federal Reporter and digests thereof, and the current volumes of the same as issued, containing reports of the decisions of the circuit courts of appeals and of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and distribute the same among the officers of the United States in accordance with the laws governing the distribution of the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States, so that one complete set, with the continuations, shall be placed with each officer and in each office or room or court room now entitled by law to receive the said reports of the Supreme Court, except as may be otherwise provided by this act. And the Secretary of the Interior shall distribute to the reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States 1 set; to the Secretary of the Senate, for the use of the Senate, not more than 10 sets; and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, for the use of the House of Representatives, not more than 12 sets, and 1 set to every court of the United States provided by law; and in case any sets shall remain undisposed of after making the foregoing distribution the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to distribute the same and the current volumes thereof as issued to such executive officers of the United States as may be designated by the Attorney-General: Provided, That under the authority of this act only such number of sets and parts of sets shall be purchased as will provide not to exceed 400 sets in all.

SEC. 2. That whenever any of such officers, office, or court room shall have a partial set of the Federal Reporter, or digest, already purchased or owned by the United States, in such case the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to procure and distribute to such officers, office, or court room sufficient volumes to make a complete set for such officer, office, or court room.

SEC. 3. That the volumes of the Supreme Court Reports and of the Federal Reporter distributed under the provisions of this and prior acts shall be and remain the property of the United States, and before distribution shall be plainly marked on their covers "The property of the United States," and shall be transmitted by the officers receiving the same to their successors in office.

SEC. 4. That such sum of money as is required to pay for the Federal Reporter and for the digest thereof, the purchase and distribution of which are provided for in this act, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That not to exceed $2 per volume shall be paid for the back volumes of such reports and for the current volumes of the Federal Reporter, and $5 per volume for the digest, the said money to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior; and the Secretary of the Interior shall include in his annual estimates submitted to Congress an estimate for the current volumes of reports the distribution of which is provided for in this act.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill what additional expense this will be to the Government?

Mr. KNOX. The additional expense will be in the neighborhood of $15,000 a year, depending somewhat on the number of sets purchased. The maximum provided for is 400 sets.

A measure similar to this passed the Senate once before. The Federal Reporter is the only publication that reports the decisions of the United States circuit and district courts and the United States court of appeals. This measure provides that they shall be distributed to such officers of the Government as are now receiving under the provisions of the law the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCISCO KREBS.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I wish to ask for the recall of a bill improperly referred and have it referred properly by unanimous consent. The House passed a bill (H. R. 27252) for the relief of Francisco Krebs and his heirs and assigns. It is a private claim. The bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands improperly. It should be recalled and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, because it has heretofore been before that committee and has been twice reported by the committee, and not only reported, but the bill has been passed through both Houses. It was vetoed last winter by the President under a misapprehension of fact, I think. At any rate, the Department of Commerce and Labor have not only withdrawn all the objections they urged, but this is a copy of a bill which they themselves prepared, and there can be no objection to it, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 27252 and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. McENERY subsequently said: I report back from the Committee on Private Land Claims favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 27252) for the relief of Francisco Krebs and his heirs and assigns.

Mr. MONEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, and upon this ground: A similar bill has passed the Senate more than once. It passed both Houses, but was vetoed by the President for reasons furnished by the Department of Commerce and Labor, because it unduly restricted the extent of the light-house property and did not provide means for accurately determining the boundaries of the property. Since then the department have made a map to suit themselves and have written this bill and sent it here for passage. It has already passed the House. I hope it will be passed by the Senate to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the Senator the act itself as it came from the House?

Mr. MONEY. No; I have not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator know that this is an exact copy of that act?

Mr. MONEY. I do not know that I can say it is, because I have not read the act carefully. If there is any difficulty about it I will let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go to the calendar.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 8, 1909.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY ON OCEAN VESSELS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States (S. Doc. No. 700), which was read and, on motion of Mr. KEAN, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Your attention is invited to recent events which have conclusively demonstrated the great value of radio-telegraphy, popularly known as "wireless" telegraphy, as an instrumentality for the preservation of life at sea.

While the honor of the first practical application of the scientific principles involved may belong to another country, it is gratifying to know that our inventors have been quick to seize upon and develop the idea, and that several systems of approved scientific merit and commercial practicability have been put into operation in the United States.

Furthermore, through the liberality of Congress and the intelligence and industry of the Navy Department, our Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts are equipped with a chain of shore stations, designed primarily for the national defense, but capable of receiving and transmitting messages by any of the systems of wireless telegraphy now in general use. Even our distant insular territories and Alaska are so equipped.

So far as our own country is concerned, steps have thus been taken effectually to prevent the establishment of a monopoly in the practical use of the new applied art.

I deem it highly desirable that the Congress, before adjournment, should enact a law requiring, within reasonable limitations, as determined by what the Government of the United States has already done and by what prudent and progressive shipowners have already found practicable, that all ocean-going steamships carrying considerable numbers of passengers on routes where wireless installations would be useful should be required to carry efficient radio-telegraphic installations and competent operators. The subject is now under consideration by the Congress, and I am advised that legislation to effect the same general purpose is also under consideration abroad.

Our interest in its enactment is keen on account of the great number of steerage as well as cabin passengers who annually arrive at and depart from our ports. What we have already done along practical business lines warrants the United States in being first among nations to enact a statute requiring the use of this safeguard of human life.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 8, 1909.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

PENSION CERTIFICATES.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution (H. Res. 505) and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up a privileged resolution—from what committee?

Mr. WANGER. This was referred to the Committee on Appropriations the day it was introduced, January 23. There has been no action upon it by that committee, so it becomes privileged.

The SPEAKER. It seems that the resolution is pending before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WANGER. It becomes privileged under the rule, not having been acted upon by that committee within seven days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 505), which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the House of Representatives, at as early a date as is convenient, with a statement of the number of pension certificates, issued under the act of February 6, 1907, received at the different pension agencies in the United States to and including the 30th day of June, 1907, and the extent to which the work in each of the pension agencies was performed without delay and kept up, and at which of said agencies, if any, the work was not kept up, and the extent to which there was delay; and, if there was any detail of extra clerks or allowance of clerk hire, what detail or allowance there was made to any or either of said agencies, and for what period; also, how the pensions are paid to the inmates of the Southern Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, the number of checks, vouchers, and other documents that were made out or handled by the Washington pension agency in making the last quarterly payment of pensions to the inmates of said branch, and the number of such inmates then paid pensions.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do I understand that it is a privileged resolution?

Mr. WANGER. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What makes it so?

Mr. WANGER. It was referred to the Committee on Appropriations on January 23, and has not been reported. Therefore, under the rules, it becomes privileged. Its object is simply to secure information. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations says he has no objection to the adoption of the resolution. I do not know whether it has been generally considered by the committee or not. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. I understand from the reading—I have no copy of the resolution before me—that the proposition is to get a report of the payments of pensions under the McCumber Act, on certificates prior to July 1, 1907. Is that it?

Mr. WANGER. Yes; the number of certificates received prior to June 30, 1907.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not include those up to 1908, if there is any importance to it?

Mr. WANGER. I have no objection at all to bringing it down to that date.

Mr. KEIFER. I think almost all the information which the gentleman wants, and which the resolution calls for, is obtainable from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions—not the action of the agencies in all respects, but I think the resolution ought to be amended so as to bring it down to 1908, if it is of any importance.

Mr. WANGER. I have no objection to striking out the word "seven," in line 8, and inserting the word "eight."

Mr. HOLLIDAY. What is the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. WANGER. To get information.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 8 strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "eight."

Mr. WANGER. The purpose of the resolution is to get information which will show the relative efficiency and economy at the different pension agencies.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry. How did this resolution ever happen to be sent to the Committee on Appropriations? It seems to me that the Committee on Pensions, or the Committee on Invalid Pensions, ought to have had jurisdiction.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Appropriations appropriates for the payment of pensions, and for the support of pension agencies, and it seemed to the occupant of the chair that that committee was the appropriate committee; anyway, the reference having been made, the committee would have jurisdiction. Without objection, the Committee on Appropriations is discharged from the consideration of the resolution.

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the amendment that is offered?

Mr. WANGER. To strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "eight," bringing it down to 1908.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

PAROLE OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 27425) to provide for the parole of juvenile offenders committed to the National Training School for Boys, Washington, D. C., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every male juvenile offender who is now or may hereafter be committed to the National Training School for Boys, and who has by his conduct given sufficient evidence that he has reformed, may be released on parole as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the board of trustees of said school that there is reasonable probability that any boy detained in the said school will, if conditionally released, remain at liberty without violating the laws, then said board of trustees may in its discretion parole such boy under such conditions and regulations as the said board of trustees may deem proper: Provided, That the parole of all juvenile offenders committed by courts other than those of the District of Columbia shall be subject to the approval of the Attorney-General of the United States.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DE ARMOND, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PROVIDING FOR PAYMENT OF COST OF DRAINAGE OF OMAHA INDIAN ALLOTTED LANDS.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 20385) to enable the Omaha Indians to protect from overflow their tribal and allotted lands located within the boundaries of any drainage district in Nebraska, with amendments.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to pay from the funds remaining to the credit of the Omaha tribe of Indians any assessments which may be made by any drainage district in the State of Nebraska on the tribal lands of said Indians to protect such lands from overflow, not exceeding an average of $8 per acre.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to pay per capita to the Indians of the Omaha tribe who have allotted lands within any such drainage district the proportionate share of such Indians in the funds remaining to the credit of said tribe after the payment provided for in section 1 of this act: Provided, That no assessments made by such drainage district on the allotment of any Indian while the same is held in trust by the United States for the use and benefit of the allottee shall be valid or constitute a lien on the land, but the Secretary of the Interior shall retain not exceeding $240 of the per capita share of any such allottee and expend the same for the payment of partial payment of the sum found by such drainage district to be due from such allottee for the purpose of protecting his lands embraced in the drainage district from overflow. Such payment shall be credited on any assessment which may be made on the allotment of said Indian after the termination of the trust by expiration of the period, issuance of a fee-simple patent, or by a conveyance under existing law, duly approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 3. That any such drainage district be, and is hereby, authorized to assess the cost of reclaiming the tribal lands of the Omaha Indians and all lands allotted to the Indians in severalty and held by patents containing restrictions as to alienation and taxation within such districts, subject to the limitation contained in the preceding section, and to condemn any of said lands necessary for the purpose of reclamation in the same manner as such district may condemn other lands: Provided, That the payments to be made or the taking of lands under the provisions of this section shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, upon application of the allottee, or his heirs, to issue a fee-simple patent to any Omaha Indian for the lands allotted to him within any such drainage district, and the issuance of such patent shall operate as a removal of all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, and taxation of the lands covered thereby.

The Clerk also read the following amendments:

Amend by striking out the word "tribe" and inserting the words "and Winnebago tribe," in line 5, page 1; by inserting the words "and Winnebago" after the word "Omaha," in lines 2 and 23, page 2, and in line 10, page 3.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I could not hear the amendments read, and I want to ask the gentleman if the amendments change the substance of the bill.

Mr. BOYD. It simply adds the Winnebago Reservation. The committee has favorably reported the Winnebago bill and recommended that the two be consolidated, and this amendment consolidates the two bills.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that the gentleman might be in luck to get one bill, without passing two at once. As I understand this bill, it is solely for the purpose of permitting the Indians' land to be included in the drainage district under control of the Secretary of the Interior, so that the lands may be drained, leaving the payment under the control of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BOYD. Yes; and the Winnebago Reservation is just north. Last summer the Secretary of Agriculture surveyed the Logan Valley, and in order to carry out the project as planned by them it is necessary to cross the two reservations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Subsequently,

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the bill presented by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BOYD] and considered by unanimous consent should have the title amended by inserting the words "and Winnebago" after the word "Omaha."

Mr. MANN. And in connection with the matter, the bill H. R. 27244 should be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the title will be amended; and, without objection, the bill on the calendar, H. R. 27244, will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. BOYD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ROBERT C. DAVEY, OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following order:

House Order No. 25.

Ordered, That there be a session of the House at 4 p. m. Sunday, February 21, 1909, for the delivery of eulogies on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. ROBERT C. DAVEY, late a Member of the House of Representatives from Louisiana.

The order was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR WESTERN DISTRICT OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from consideration of the bill (H. R. 27061) to provide for the appointment of an additional judge in and for the western district of Washington.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a resident of the western divison of the western district of Washington as an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Washington, who shall reside in said division, whose length of term, compensation, duties, and powers shall be the same as now provided by law for the judge of said district.

SEC. 2. That the present district judge in said district and the one appointed under this act shall agree between themselves upon the division of business and assignment of cases for trial in said district: Provided, however, That in case the said two district judges do not agree the senior circuit judge of the ninth circuit shall make all necessary orders for the division of business and the assignment of cases for trial in said district.

The following committee amendments were read:

Strike out, in lines 4, 5, and 6, the following: "a resident of the western division of the western district of Washington as."

Strike out, in lines 7 and 8, the following: "who shall reside in said division."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Washington to explain the necessity for the creation of this new judgeship.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to authorize the appointment of an additional United States district judge in my home State of Washington—in the western district of that State. The necessity which causes me to bring this bill forward at this time is the tremendous volume of legal business in that western district of Washington. That volume of business is greater than any one judge can properly attend to, and the load of labor and responsibility is breaking our judge down. You will understand that this bill does not create a new judicial district, but merely provides for an additional judge, so that if this bill passes there will be two district judges in the western district of Washington State instead of one judge, as now. The passage of this bill is earnestly recommended by Mr. Bonaparte, the United States Attorney-General. This bill has also behind it the unanimous report of the House Judiciary Committee. In the report of the Judiciary Committee on this bill is found the following significant language:

It thus appears that the work accumulating and being done in the western district of Washington is more than twice that of the average district, and is only equaled by those districts which have two or more judges.

I can say, Mr. Speaker, that there is a tremendous volume of legal business in that district.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Has not the State of Washington now two district judges?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes; there are two district judges now in that State. There are two judicial districts in the State and one judge in each district.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And that is considerably more than the average State in the Union to-day has, is it not, in proportion to the population of the States?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that, in my judgment, population is not a safe rule to go by in a matter of this kind. The more reliable rule is the amount of legal business in the district. And according to the figures compiled by the United States Attorney-General, and submitted in his last annual report, there is about twice as much legal business in the western district of Washington as in the average judicial district. There is not another judicial district in the United States—having but one judge—that has as large a volume of legal business as exists in this western district of my State.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How much business is there in that district?

Mr. CUSHMAN. The volume of business is great. I have some figures here, taken from the last annual report of the Attorney-General, which figures amply support my statement. I could not presume at this time to read all these figures; but, for instance, during the fiscal year 1908 in that district the number of general civil cases—that is, cases in which the United States was not a party—was as follows: Two hundred and seventy-two cases commenced and 249 terminated. And these figures of cases commenced and terminated in this district are greater than the number of cases of a similar class commenced and terminated in the district of Minnesota, the district of Nebraska, the district of Indiana, the southern district of Ohio, the southern district of California, or the eastern district of Missouri, each of which has a resident circuit as well as a resident district judge.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very often, I will say to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN], I think that these district judges are created in places where they are not needed, and for a State the size of Washington in population to acquire three district judges to attend to business in the district court seems to me an anomaly and out of all proportion to the amount of business that judges do in other States.

Mr. CUSHMAN. But the figures I have just read—and many other figures that I have not time to read—show that there is a great deal larger volume of legal business in this district than in any other district in the United States having but one resident judge. My statements are based upon the court records. And we see no prospect of relief under present conditions. The circuit judges of the ninth circuit are engaged entirely in the work of the court of appeals. A circuit judge has not presided at nisi prius or in the circuit court of the western division of Washington for over nine years. And Judge Hanford, the resident district judge, practically never has a vacation and works half of every night.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think, as a rule, since the establishment of a court of appeals, that it has been the habit or custom of circuit judges to sit at nisi prius at all.

Mr. MANN. Or to do much of any other work. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman inform the House what the character of this excessive business in that district is?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and to the House that, in the first place, there is the usual volume of all kinds of litigation which are common to other districts. It is a big district, measured in miles; and its location and the rapid development of the country both tend to make much litigation. This district is surrounded almost on three sides by navigable waters. It contains a number of government military and other reservations. The city of Portland, the metropolis of Oregon, lies just beyond its southern border. The largest cities of western Canada lie just beyond its northern border. Of all the judicial districts in the United States, this one is the closest to Alaska. The port of Puget Sound is entirely within this district, and it is one of the greatest in the Union. Its railroad building, mileage, and development within the past few years have been very great. There is an immense lumber industry in this State, the fishing interests are large, and there are some mining interests. Then, in addition to all this, there is an immense maritime business in that district. This admiralty work is a distinct branch of business that the districts in the interior States do not have.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman inform us of the number of admiralty cases in the district during the last year?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I regret that offhand I can not give the gentleman the exact number of this particular kind of cases, but it is a large number.

Mr. MANN. Of course, when the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] states there is a great deal of business in that district, we appreciate that that is always the case. The State of Washington has 3 Members of Congress and 2 district judges. The city of Chicago has 10 Members of Congress, and probably more proportionate law business than the proportion of Members of Congress, and yet we do not ask for 10 members of the district court.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I do not underestimate the immense court business of the city of Chicago, and yet I believe that an analysis of the figures in the last report of the Attorney-General, making a comparison between the northern district of Illinois (where Chicago is) and this district in my State, will result favorably to my contention—remembering always that we have but one judge and Chicago has several. The United States attorney urgently recommends the passage of this bill, basing his action upon the figures showing the amount of litigation in this district. The House Judiciary Committee went carefully into all the figures showing the relative amount of business in these various districts, and then unanimously recommended the passage of this bill to give us another judge. As I said a moment ago, there is great railroad activity in the State of Washington at present. Its railroad mileage, building and developed, within the past few years has been very great, Washington being in the two years just passed one of the five States with greatest mileage built during each of such years and being the only State so preeminent during both of such years.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is very likely true. The State of Illinois probably has more railroad mileage than any other State in the Union. It is all built, practically, under the direction and control largely—because it all went into the hands of receivers in the end—of one judge in the circuit court at Chicago, Judge Drummond, and he handled all these railroads himself for many years. Now, if the gentleman will permit, we now have on the calendar a bill creating an additional judge in New York, an additional judge in Pennsylvania, and an additional judge in the State of Washington. We have bills pending urgently asking for additional judges by various Members of Congress in their districts. And it seems to me that we are called upon to determine whether we will increase the number of officeholders at this time with a great deficiency staring us in the face, or whether we will make people go to the state courts, where we have plenty of judges, and make them try some of these cases.

Mr. CUSHMAN. As far as the state courts of my State are concerned I can say to the gentlemen that there are three judges of the state court—the superior court—now in my own county, and the legislature of the State has just authorized another, which makes four. That is four judges of the state court in one county. In Seattle, in King County, I think they have about six judges of the state or superior court. That makes about ten judges of the state court in two counties, and there are about nineteen counties in this federal judicial district. Of course the two counties I have just mentioned are the largest. But what I have said is enough to show that the State is not attempting to take any advantage of the Nation by unloading the judicial work of that region exclusively upon the federal judge. Most of the cases in my State which are brought in the federal court are cases of such a nature that they can not be started in any other court. The amount of federal litigation that exists in that district is appalling. The present district judge, Judge Hanford, has not had a vacation in years, and the old man is breaking down under this continuous strain. More cases have been started in the last six months in the federal court in this district than can be tried in a year. And just at this time, if the gentleman will permit me to state it, I will say there is an immense admiralty case pending in the federal court in this district which the judge can not try now and does not know whether he can ever reach it. The lawyers on both sides by unanimous consent and by stipulation transferred that case from the federal court in this district clear across the continent to the federal court in New York City, and they are trying it there now. That was the only hope they had of getting it heard. There is another case in that district now which represents millions of dollars. It is a case which involves the title to a vast amount of the tidelands along the water front of the harbor of the city of Tacoma. When the judge will ever reach this case is a mystery. And remember that I am not in any sense criticising Judge Hanford. He is doing all any judge can do with a most difficult situation.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the circuit judge try some of the cases?

Mr. CUSHMAN. The circuit judges are busy. The ninth circuit is one of the largest circuits in the country, extending all over the western part of the United States, including Alaska and the Hawaiian Islands. The circuit judges do not need to apologize for not helping, because they are busy.

Mr. BATES. Is it not true that the bankruptcy business has largely increased the work of the federal judges?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I think that is true in a general way over the country at large, although the bankruptcy business is not very large in our district. Our people lead in most things, but we have never sought to assert our supremacy over our neighbors by the volume of our bankruptcy business. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two. How long has Judge Hanford been upon the bench?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Oh, I think over twenty years.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How old is he?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I think he is about 63 or 64 years of age, as I recall. He is not feeble physically, although he is sadly overworked; and mentally he has not a superior on the bench in America.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has he charged the grand jury to investigate any trusts out in that country?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Oh, I do not know.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I am asking this seriously.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I do not know whether he has or not, presumably he has been performing his duty, and there are no complaints that he has not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The report of the Attorney-General shows there is not a single one pending in that State.

Mr. CUSHMAN. That shows what a law-abiding people we are. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The fact that you want another judge—as many district judges as you have Members of Congress—indicates to the contrary. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUSHMAN. Well, I may be out of Congress and I might get this judgeship. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, for the very reason I stated to the gentleman a while ago, if I could be sure that we had to lose the gentleman from Congress, which I pray to God will not——

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be taken into this discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will suspend. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that the House is not in order, which point is sustained. The House will be in order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, I would like to continue my conversation with the gentleman which I began.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes. [Laughter.] The gentleman nodded and I took that to mean he yielded.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I certainly yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, does the gentleman know or not whether any of the federal judges have charged the grand juries to investigate violations of the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I have been so busy with my congressional duties that I have assumed that the men on the bench were performing their duties while I was performing mine; therefore I have not investigated that subject.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, it is such an unusual thing for the district judge to charge the grand jury as to that law, I thought possibly the gentleman would remember; but the Attorney-General's report shows there is not a single case pending of that character there. And, I want to say, it is the same in my own State of Tennessee. And I want to find out if some of the district judges were obeying the law——

Mr. CUSHMAN. I do not know whether the judge has charged any grand jury along that line or not, it is not my function——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It has been my function to try and get the judge in my State to charge the grand jury, and he did so; and then the district attorney would not let the witnesses go before the federal grand jury. That was in the tobacco trust matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question before I give my consent. This bill provides for an extra judge in the western district of the State?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Yes.

Mr. MACON. How about the business in the eastern district of that State?

Mr. CUSHMAN. The business is not so large in the eastern part of the State.

Mr. MACON. Then, does not the gentleman think that they ought to have the State redistricted instead of creating a new judge for the western district?

Mr. CUSHMAN. We would have been very glad, indeed, to have that done, but after conferring with the members of the Committee on the Judiciary, I determined I would not make the attempt to do that.

Mr. MACON. Why?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Because there is a large extra expense involved in the creation of a new district.

Mr. MACON. Not a new district. I said to redistrict the State and throw some of this work on the judge of the eastern district.

Mr. CUSHMAN. There is plenty of work in the eastern district for one man. There is more than enough work in the western district for two men. Now, you can not divide the work for three and one-half men in a manner that will enable two men to do it.

Mr. MACON. Has the gentleman taken a census of the work in the eastern district and found that there is more work than one man can do?

Mr. CUSHMAN. There is a great deal more work than one judge can attend to. That question was gone into by the Judiciary Committee years ago when the State was divided into two judicial districts.

Mr. MACON. At what time do they convene the courts in the morning?

Mr. CUSHMAN. About 8 o'clock. That is earlier than we convene.

Mr. MACON. If the gentleman will state that the federal courts in the State of Washington convene at 8 o'clock in the morning and stay in session until 12, and then take up again at half past 1 and stay until 5, I will not object.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I do not know. I think they meet nearer 9 o'clock, as a rule, than they do at 8.

Mr. MACON. Does not the gentleman know that it is the habit of federal judges to convene court at 10 o'clock?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Not in our State; no. They meet at 9 o'clock. The work the judge does on the bench is not the only work he has to do, any more than the work we do in this House in five hours represents the entire day's work with us.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, knowing that the population has a great deal to do with the business of a court, and that Washington has not more than half the population of Arkansas, and we having only two federal judges, and they being able to discharge all the business of the court, I am bound to object, feeling that two judges can do the business of the courts of the State of Washington if two judges can do the business of the courts of the State of Arkansas.

CHANGE OF ENTRY IN LAND TRACTS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 26734) to permit change of entry in case of mistake of the description of tracts intended to be entered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 26734) to permit change of entry in case of mistake of the description of tracts intended to be entered.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2372 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2372. In all cases where an entry, selection, or location has been or shall hereafter be made of a tract of land not intended to be entered, the entryman, selector, or locator, or, in case of his death, his legal representatives, or, when the claim is by law transferable, his or their transferees, may, in any case coming within the provisions of this section, file his or their affidavit, with such additional evidence as can be procured showing the mistake as to the numbers of the tract intended to be entered and that every reasonable precaution and exertion was used to avoid the error, with the register and receiver of the land district in which such tract of land is situate, who should transmit the evidence submitted to them, in each case, together with their written opinion both as to the existence of the mistake and the credibility of every person testifying thereto, to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who, if he be entirely satisfied that the mistake has been made and that every reasonable precaution and exertion has been made to avoid it, is authorized to change the entry and transfer the payment from the tract erroneously entered to that intended to be entered, if the same has not been disposed of and is subject to entry, or, if not subject to entry, then to any other tract liable to such entry, selection, or location; but the oath of the person interested shall in no case be deemed sufficient, in the absence of other corroborating testimony, to authorize such change of entry, nor shall anything herein contained affect the right of third persons."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman to explain the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, this is an amendment of section 2372 of the Revised Statutes, and is in the form proposed by the Secretary of the Interior in a letter, which is printed in the report on the bill. It has been unanimously approved by the Committee on Public Lands. This section was enacted in 1824, at a time when the Government sold its lands, and it provided that where a mistake had been made in the description of a tract the Commissioner of the General Land Office could, where a mistake in description had been made, under certain conditions allow an amendment. It related only to lands that were sold, but the Land Office for many years has applied the same principle to homestead and other classes of entries. The law, however, did not allow an amendment if the tract had been transferred, and cases arise where the mistake is not discovered until a transfer has been made, and it is impossible for the transferee to secure the lands which he purchased or which he believed he purchased.

In several decisions the department has called attention, as is shown in the House report, to the fact that the rule which applies under the law to sales ought to apply to other entries, and that it ought to go further, and to apply to cases where there has been a transfer. The Commissioner of the General Land Office in his report last year recommended the passage of legislation of this character.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman whether this bill interferes in the least with the land suits out there in the State of Washington or anywhere?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is just to correct some mistake made in the law, where it is inadequate to meet the situation?

Mr. MONDELL. It is merely to allow correction of an error.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS CONDADO BAY, PORTO RICO.

Mr. LARRINAGA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 26838) to authorize Behn Brothers, of San Juan, P. R., to construct a bridge across a portion of the Condado Bay, at the eastern extremity of San Juan Island, Porto Rico.

Be it enacted, etc., That Behn Brothers, of San Juan, P. R., be, and are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across a portion of Condado Bay, at the eastern extremity of San Juan Island, Porto Rico, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

CONDEMNED CANNON TO BEDFORD, IND.

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House joint resolution 234, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 234) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish two condemned bronze cannon and cannon balls to the city of Bedford, Ind.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish to the city of Bedford, Ind., to be placed at the monument erected in said city, two bronze or brass condemned cannons or fieldpieces, with their carriages and with suitable outfit of cannon balls, not needed for present service, the same to be mounted and used on the public building grounds at said city, or on the grounds occupied by a soldiers' monument about to be erected at said city, and to be subject at all times to the orders of the Secretary of War: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States in the delivery of the same.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Indiana," in line 4, down to and including the word "Indiana," in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the words "to be placed at the monument erected in said city."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. CHANEY. There is a repetition by the amendment in terms of the bill, and I have indicated on the resolution I send to the desk the elimination of certain words which will prevent the repetition.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the language on line 9, after the word "service," down to and including the word "city," in line 1 of page 2.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to make this inquiry of the gentleman. I have been informed on the floor of the House, I think it was, that we could get these canons by simply asking for them. If that is the case, then there is no need of the resolution. I am for your resolution, but I understand you can get them from the War Department simply by asking for them. If that is now the law, why do we want the resolution?

Mr. CHANEY. The gentleman's information is incorrect. These are bronze guns, which can not be given out or lent upon the authority of the Secretary of War, and can only be obtained by the passage of a resolution.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then, what kind of guns can we get out by applying for them?

Mr. CHANEY. Cast-iron guns can be obtained in that way.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The amendment offered by Mr. CHANEY was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS TENNESSEE RIVER, MARION COUNTY, TENN.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 8540.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 8540) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River in Marion County, Tenn.," approved May 20, 1902, as amended by an act approved February 1, 1905, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River in Marion County, Tenn.'"

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River in Marion County, Tenn.," approved May 20, 1902, as amended by an act approved February 1, 1905, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River in Marion County Tenn.,' approved May 20, 1902," be, and the same hereby is, revived and declared to be in full force and effect, except that section 7 of said act be, and the same hereby is, amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. That this act shall be null and void unless the bridge herein authorized shall be commenced within one year and completed within three years from the 1st day of January, 1909."

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the bridge to be constructed under the provisions of said act shall be constructed in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of bridges across navigable waters,' approved March 23, 1906."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. REEDER. I did not note the usual provision being there, that this law may be repealed.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. This is a mere extension of time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MOON of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the conference report on the bill S. 6359, and ask that the House agree to the conference report.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire the report or the statement read?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the conference report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 6359) entitled "An act to change the name and jurisdiction of the inferior court of justice of the peace in the District of Columbia," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

Page 1, line 4, of said amendment, strike out the word "five."

Page 6, lines 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, strike out the proviso and insert in lieu thereof the following:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 6359) entitled "An act to change the name and jurisdiction of the inferior court of justice of the peace in the District of Columbia," submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

Corrects clerical error by restoring the present number of justices of the peace (6), the House amendment having reduced the number to 5. House recedes.

Provides that after the first vacancy the number of judges shall be 5. Senate recedes.

Provides for the appointment of the judges of said municipal court for a term of four years, as proposed by the House. Senate recedes.

Provides that the expenditures incurred in executing the act shall not exceed the total amount of revenues and fees of the court. Senate recedes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. SIMS. Is this a unanimous report?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] did not meet with us, and did not sign the report. I talked with him about it, and he said that he was opposed to the whole legislation, and therefore would not sign the report.

Mr. SIMS. I do not see the gentleman from Kentucky present.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report.

The conference report was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District business.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with Mr. OVERSTREET in the chair.

OVERHEAD TRACK INTO SQUARE 328.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (S. 5429) to facilitate the use for manufacturing purposes of square No. 328, in the city of Washington, as authorized in the act of Congress of February 1, 1907.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to promote the purposes of the act approved February 1, 1907, allowing the manufacture of ice on square No. 328, in the city of Washington, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to issue permits for the laying and maintaining of a line of railroad or a switch from square No. 300 across Twelfth street and into said square No. 328 by an overhead track to be approved by said commissioners, and for the laying of a conduit and pipes from the said square No. 328 to and into the Potomac River across and under Water street, for the taking of water from said river to be used for manufacturing purposes in said square: Provided, That for purposes of said overhead track no present grades of Twelfth street shall be disturbed, and that overhead track shall have a clearance of at least 14 feet above the curb of said street: And provided further, That the overhead track and the conduit and pipes hereby authorized shall be located as may be directed by the said Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and be laid and maintained under their inspection in such locations as they may prescribe, and the cost of such inspection and of replacing the pavements, curbs, and sidewalks disturbed by said work shall be paid by the parties to whom the permits shall be granted.

SEC. 2. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, square 328 is practically an unoccupied square in the southwestern portion of the city. There are upon this square perhaps four or five old buildings. It has been purchased by the Washington Market Company under the law passed in 1907. Square 300 is just opposite. This bill has the approval of the Commissioners of the District, and unless some gentleman desires to ask a question, I ask for a vote.

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Who will pay the property damage which may be caused by the construction of this overhead track?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not understand that there will be any property damage.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman wish to convey to the House the idea that overhead tracks can be built over a street without damaging the adjacent property?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. One side is owned by the Washington Market Company and the other is owned by the railroad company. They are both entirely willing to have this work done, and will make no claim for damages.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this track interfere with any property owned by private parties?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. It is altogether between the market company and the railroad company?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is just Twelfth street between the two squares, the one being owned by the railroad company and the other being owned by the market company.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the street to be lowered at any point where the tracks are put overhead?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any pavement to be torn up, or are any sidewalks to be displaced?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, sir. It would be a good thing if they might tear up the old pavement and have a better one, but that is not anticipated.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I did not catch what the gentleman said. This is to allow a private track to an ice factory, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There are two provisions in this bill; first, to allow an overhead track 14 feet above the street, across Twelfth street, from one square to the other.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who is going to lay the track?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The market company.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the market company?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. By the provisions of the law of 1907, the market company was allowed to build an ice plant on square 328. It is the same company that controls the Center Market down here. It is expected that in a few years, when we come to remove the buildings on the south side of Pennsylvania avenue, they will have to go somewhere else.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who will use the track?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Washington Market Company.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is a private concern?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I suppose it is proposed to erect a large ice plant on square 328. That is the purpose for which they bought this square of land.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is to be their track and they only are to use it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can see no objection to other people using it. I suppose the public will have the benefit of it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to know whether it is to be a public or a private railroad.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can not say. If anybody desires to ship anything to that company over this overhead track, I suppose he can do so.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there any competitor of this company?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not that I know of.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then this is giving one concern the only private railroad in the city?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can not see any objection to building this railroad over the street 14 feet high; it does not interfere with the street or anybody else.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not believe in giving private individuals or private companies in this city, or to private companies or individuals in the country, private railway rights.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This is only an extension of a track.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; and they are given to the fellow that has money and enterprise and influence enough to go to that expense, while the man in moderate circumstances can not get such a track.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the gentleman from Tennessee would be willing to give this company or anybody this little extension.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; to everybody, but I do not want to give it to one man or one company, because everybody can not have the same right. It thus produces an inequality.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As far as I am concerned, I will vote to give it to anybody that applies for it.

Mr. MADDEN. As I understand, there is no provision for the payment or compensation to the Government for the franchise granted here, is there?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. MADDEN. In the granting of franchises to the street car companies in the District, there is usually a provision in the bill calling for the payment of a certain percentage of the receipts as taxes, is there not?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; but this bill is not on all fours with a proposition of that kind. The extension can not exceed 100 feet in length, where they desire to have it extended over the square on the west side and across Twelfth street.

Mr. MADDEN. This proposes to construct a track for the movement of freight across an important street in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; but not in the most important part of the city; it is in the southwest, down by the river, where the land will be occupied mostly for manufacturing purposes, and where the railroads now have two squares for terminals.

Mr. MADDEN. Whether it is an important part of the city or not, it is granting an important privilege to a private institution, and that institution or company should be required to pay some compensation for the privilege. It does not seem to me that a franchise of this importance should be granted without some compensation to the Public Treasury for the privilege.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the bill now before the House was reported by the committee when I was present, but I had had no opportunity to examine the street or the proposed improvements. I did not want to report it if it was an improper matter, so I did not vote for or against the report, with a view of examining the property afterwards. I have not had an opportunity to examine it, and therefore I am neither opposing nor consenting to the specific improvement. But I do join heartily in the statement by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that, as a general proposition, we ought not to permit the use of streets by private corporations without compensation.

But, Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of discussing another matter, another bill, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 27888) to regulate the price of gas in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the 1st day of July, 1909, no person, firm, copartnership, association, or corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of fuel or illuminating gas in the District of Columbia shall sell or otherwise dispose of the same to any person, firm, copartnership, association, or corporation in the District of Columbia for a price exceeding 90 cents per thousand cubic feet, the price to be regulated from time to time in the future as hereinafter provided; such gas to be of not less than 18 candlepower, measured by the test established by existing law, and that the same shall not contain more than 10 per cent of carbon monoxide gas.

SEC. 2. That section 5 of an act entitled "An act relating to the sale of gas in the District of Columbia," approved June 6, 1896, be, and the same is hereby, repealed and all pending proceedings thereunder vacated.

SEC. 3. That within sixty days after the passage of this act it shall be the duty of every corporation manufacturing gas in the District of Columbia to institute an action in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, petitioning the said court to make or cause to be made a judicial valuation of the property in the conduct of its business, the said valuation to be made under such rules and regulations as the chief justice and the justices thereof shall prescribe, after notice thereof of not less than thirty days from the filing of said petition to be served upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall thereupon become a party to the case, with right of appeal to both the petitioners and the commissioners from the decision of the said court to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, and therefrom to the Supreme Court of the United States. That in making said valuation the good will and franchise of said corporation shall not be appraised; and that after the said judicial appraisement has been duly made and found, as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for such corporation to increase its capital stock to an amount not exceeding the value of its property so found and ascertained, less all legal and valid liens, encumbrances, or legal and bona fide obligations of any kind whatsoever there may be then outstanding against the said property, for which it may issue to the holders thereof so much of said stock as may be sufficient to retire the same at its par value. That if any such corporation shall desire to issue bonds upon the property of such corporation by mortgage or otherwise, upon petition therefor to said court, setting forth the necessity thereof and the amount of stock issued by said corporation and outstanding, it shall be lawful for said court, or the chief justice and justices thereof, as the case may be, or one of them, after not less than thirty days' notice from the filing of said petition to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, under regulations to be prescribed by said court, as aforesaid, to permit the issuance of such bonds: Provided, That the amount of stock and bonds issued hereunder shall in no case exceed the actual value of the property of the corporation used in the conduct of its business, exclusive of good will and franchise and the cost of any extensions and enlargements of the plants that it may be necessary hereafter to make.

SEC. 4. That on and after the appraisement of the property used in the conduct of its business and the increase of its capital stock, as hereinbefore provided, the standard rate of dividends to be paid by such corporation to its stockholders shall be 6 per cent per annum on the par value of its capital stock, which rate shall not thereafter be increased except as hereinafter provided; and if, during any year ending on the 30th day of June the maximum net price per thousand cubic feet charged by the said corporation has been less than the price in this act specified, the said corporation may during the following year declare and pay dividends exceeding the standard rate above named in the ratio of one-fifth of 1 per cent for every 1 cent of reduction of said maximum net price below the standard price, as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 5. That if the net profits of the corporation applicable to the payment of dividends in any year amount to a larger sum than is sufficient to pay the dividends which the corporation is herein authorized to pay, the excess above the sum necessary for that purpose may be accumulated as a reserve fund, not to exceed 5 per cent of the par value of the capital stock of the corporation, said reserve to be subject to the control of said corporation as its interests may require.

SEC. 6. That on and after the passage of this act every corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of gas in the District of Columbia shall open and keep a set of books in the manner and form prescribed by the public-service commission of the State of New York or by a system to be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

SEC. 7. That the said corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase, own, and operate for its own use and benefit coal lands, wherever situate, and any other sources of supply of raw materials used in manufacturing its principal product or its by-products.

SEC. 8. That the right to amend or repeal this act is reserved.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, for a long time, I do not remember how many months, there has been an active agitation going on in a part of the newspaper press of Washington for the purpose of reducing the price of gas in the District of Columbia and making such other amendatory legislation as was desirable.

In 1896 a bill was passed reducing the price of gas, and in it was contained a section known as "section 5," authorizing the gas company to reissue their capital stock, based upon a valuation to be determined by the supreme court of the District of Columbia. That act lay dormant, no attempt being made to exercise its powers for many years. Last year, I do not remember the exact time, a petition was filed under that act for the valuation of the Georgetown Gas Company. Proceedings were held under that petition by the court, an auditor was appointed to appraise the value of the property of the company in pursuance of that act of Congress. The appraisement was made under that act which was entirely an ex parte proceeding, and the auditor in making the appraisement included as a part of the valuation upon which stock should be issued the value of the good will of the franchise.

Final action was not completed under that law. A petition was filed in the meantime to proceed with the Washington Gaslight Company in the same manner as with the Georgetown company. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia, through the corporation counsel, applied for a writ of prohibition to the court of appeals, alleging that the act was void—was unconstitutional—requiring the court to perform a function that was nonjudicial. The court of appeals, by a divided court, held the act void. Appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, which appeal is now pending. If the Supreme Court of the United States reverses the court of appeals and sustains the supreme court of the District of Columbia, then proceedings under the petition of both the Georgetown and the Washington Gaslight companies can proceed to a finality. As soon as the appraisement is made the stock can be issued under section 5 of the act of 1896 for the value found, which, according to the appraisement in the Georgetown company, includes the good will and franchise. That will take place if this act or some other act prohibiting such a course is not passed before next December. In all probability the Supreme Court of the United States will pass upon that act in September or October. If that court holds as I have indicated, the stock can be issued under the authority of that act, and being issued by the authority of Congress, based upon a judicial determination of value, it is my humble opinion that no reduction of the price of gas afterwards can take place that will not give reasonable earnings, say 6 per cent, upon that issue of stock, whatever it may be. To avoid that possibility a bill was introduced last session of this Congress by the chairman of the committee to repeal section 5 of the act of 1896. It was considered by the District Committee and reported favorably, and passed this House the first district day after the first Monday in December. It went to the other end of the Capitol, where it still remains without action.

The committee also had a bill before it to reduce the price of gas to 80 cents. The committee reported a bill to reduce the price to 90 cents last session, and during this session in the House, prior to the holidays, the first District day after the first Monday in December, that bill was passed with an amendment reducing the price to 85 cents. That bill went over to the other body and has been there ever since.

On account of the action of the coroner's jury here upon the death of three persons, commonly called the "Bremerman family," the question of the character of the gas furnished by the Washington Gaslight Company was considered by the Bureau of Chemistry in the Department of Agriculture. That bureau made several analyses and found that the gas furnished by the Washington Gaslight Company, which was analyzed, ran from 22 to 29 per cent, as I now recall it, of carbon monoxide gas. The matter was referred to the district attorney, and from him to the Attorney-General of the United States, and by him to the President of the United States, and in a special message from the President of the United States transmitted to Congress. The Commissioners prepared a bill, which was introduced by the chairman of this committee, limiting the percentage of carbon monoxide gas in gas to be used in the District of Columbia to not exceeding 10 per cent. The District Committee has had hearings at quite considerable length on this question of the carbon monoxide in illuminating gas, from which I think it can be said without controversy that if we limit the amount of carbon monoxide gas to 10 per cent, we exclude the use of water gas, or carbureted water gas, entirely.

That is the result, according to the statements of every expert that has been before the committee, whether his name was furnished by the commissioners or by the gas company, so that the wording had as well be that the manufacture of water gas of any kind is hereafter prohibited in the District of Columbia, for that is what it means. The report of Doctor Wiley and the other experts from the Bureau of Chemistry describe water gas, and that report says it is a very dangerous and insidious gas; that it is, to speak of it in numerical terms, five or six times more poisonous than coal gas. Upon the other hand, the gas commissioner of the State of Massachusetts, if I use the title correctly, the chief gas inspector of the city of New York, and another expert by the name of Forestall, came before our committee and gave us elaborate statements as to the manufacture of water gas. Water gas, pure and simple, is colorless and odorless, practically without candlepower in the way of illumination, but may be used for illuminating purposes by using the mantle and may be used for fuel gas without the mantle, but when used for illuminating gas it is carbureted—that is, a certain per cent of gas made from oil is mixed with it to give it the required illuminating power. The evidence has shown, I think beyond question, that 80 per cent of all the gas furnished by the Washington Gaslight Company is carbureted water gas, mixed with, say, 15 or 20 per cent of coal gas. Therefore, if we take the statements of the experts of the Department of Agriculture, carbureted water gas is necessarily more dangerous to life and health than coal gas.

If we take the average statement, it is impossible to reduce carbon-monoxide gas and limit it to 10 per cent without necessarily excluding water gas; but upon the average the experts made the statement that the gas made from coal contains 5, 6, or 7 per cent of carbon-monoxide gas; therefore in the leakage of gas through accident, carelessness, or otherwise it takes a longer time for coal gas to poison or to produce death than it does carbureted water gas; that the effect of carbureted water gas is to poison rather than to suffocate. So we were met at the threshhold with the alternative that we must either abolish or prohibit the use of water gas in the District of Columbia altogether or else not limit the percentage of carbon monoxide to 10 per cent. That is the question before the committee and that is the question before Congress. These experts whom I have named—the gas commissioner, as I remember his title, of the State of Massachusetts, and the chief gas inspector of the city of New York, Mr. Forestall, a gas engineer and expert—claim that the poison of water gas, or carbureted water gas, does not result in five or six times as many fatal accidents as from the use of coal gas. They said, or some of them did, that the examinations, as far as they had made them, of deaths caused by carbureted water gas showed that the exposures were long enough to have produced death with gas containing less than 10 per cent of carbon monoxide or coal gas, because when you speak of gas containing less than 10 per cent of carbon monoxide you necessarily mean but two kinds, one is coal gas and the other natural gas. The bill of the commissioners is before our committee. Additional hearings have been asked by the commissioners, and they have been granted. The House has passed a resolution authorizing the subpœnaing of witnesses and payment of expenses incident out of the contingent fund of the House. Therefore we are in condition, as far as expenses are concerned, to continue this investigation.

If we continue it, in all probability it will run through the rest of this session and no bill can be passed of any kind. It has appeared from newspaper statements that the committee or subcommittee at the other end of the Capitol is considering all these propositions as one. At the other end it appears that the committee contemplates reporting one bill containing all these propositions. Being so near adjournment, with the vast number of privileged matters that will take up the time of the House and the time of the Senate in the little time remaining, it appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that if we are to have legislation it can only come in two ways. One is for the Senate to pass the bills the House has sent there without amendment, and those bills do not relate to carbon-monoxide gas at all; the other is to immediately pass a bill along the lines I have suggested, and for which I have introduced this bill. If we eliminate as a part of the appraisement the value of the good will and the value of the franchise, it seems to me there is no reasonable objection to a stock issue——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Before the gentleman gets away from the discussion of the carbon-monoxide gas, can the gentleman tell us very briefly what the process of the manufacture of that gas is and the process of manufacturing coal gas?

Mr. SIMS. Why, Mr. Chairman, I do not assume any ulterior motive in the gentleman's question, but I am afraid I will come nearer exposing my ignorance than giving the information, but the information before the committee was to the effect that water gas is made by passing superheated steam over a bed of burning coals. I do not know by what process oil gas is made, but it is mixed with water gas, and that is called "carbureted gas." The water gas is odorless and without candlepower; the candlepower is given by the mixture of oil gas, which results in its having odor that is familiar, no doubt, to the gentleman. As to technically describing the process of manufacturing any kind of gas, I am unable to, except the sort we make here, which is entirely harmless.

Mr. MANN. It would be very difficult to describe the manufacture of that kind of gas at the time. As I understand it, so-called "water gas" is made without the use of much coal.

Mr. SIMS. It can be made without the use of coal except for manufacturing purposes; that is, to operate machinery.

Mr. MANN. But to make the ordinary coal gas requires the use of a large amount of coal; the reduction of a large amount of coal to coke.

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. One kind of gas is made from water, of which we have plenty?

Mr. SIMS. That is true.

Mr. MANN. And the other kind of gas is made from coal, which we are trying to conserve?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, that is exactly correct. I examined the experts before our committee along that line, and they stated that there were only certain kinds of coal from which gas could be made—that it could not be made from all kinds. I asked them if the country went into the manufacture of coal gas exclusively, if it would not necessarily draw heavily upon the supply of coal suitable for manufacturing gas. The answer, of course, was that inevitably it would.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been in favor of a very great and extensive use of water. As the House knows, I am absolutely in favor of people drinking it—in Tennessee, or Kentucky, or Illinois, and everywhere else—as much as possible. If we can use water gas—which, according to the hearings, is cheaper than coal gas and of which we all know the supply is inexhaustible—with safety to health and life, why, I am the last person that would object to the extended use of water gas.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is always interesting and well informed. If he will pardon me, I would like to ask him if the hearings indicate that anybody takes gas as a steady diet?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have seen nothing in the hearings that indicates that that is true.

Mr. MANN. Is either kind of gas wholesome for breathing?

Mr. SIMS. Neither.

Mr. MANN. It is a question of a little matter of time as to which would kill the quicker?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Illinois has given us a great law, which I hope to see extended, namely, the pure-food law, I know he is interested in whatever we eat and whatever we breathe, and therefore any question from him is accepted by me as coming from a man who has nothing but the public interests at heart. Now, I do not believe that the passage of the laws we have had before us, limiting the use of carbon-monoxide gas and which prevent the use of water gas, will result in all the large cities of the country being forced at once to go into the manufacture of coal gas. But this is the capital of the Nation. We certainly want the safest and the best gas that can be made.

The evidence before our committee showed one thing which seems to me to be incontrovertible, and that is that the carbureted water gas made by the Washington Gas Company is as good, safe, and wholesome, if the gentleman wants to use that term, as water gas can be made. But when we take the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, and those experts from his bureau, they testify that it is absolutely impossible to make a water gas of any kind that will, with the same possibilities as to accidents, as to carelessness, as to leakage, and all those things that happen and that nobody can prevent, that health will be better conserved and life less endangered by using coal gas.

But I say I do not suppose, and it is not my purpose to ask for the passage of the bill I have read with a view of affecting the manufacture of water gas in the great cities where they have it. They are located in sovereign States, and they look at this matter from their view point and do as they see proper. Mr. Chairman, I would not ordinarily ask the committee of which I have the honor to be a member to be discharged from the consideration of a bill before it had considered it and reported it to the House. But it seems to me that in the present case the importance of such action is so great that I will not be treating the committee or any member of it with the slightest discourtesy in making such a request. Not a feature of this bill is new. We have read of it in the newspapers day in and day out, we have had long hearings, and further extended hearings will not differ materially from those that we have had. In other words, there will be no new information. One set of experts may be corroborated, or another set, or both.

Now, as to the capitalization. If we pass this bill and the Senate does not pass the bill that we have passed and sent over there, to repeal section 5 of the act of 1896, then when the District Committee is appointed next December the Washington Gaslight Company may have issued its stock and also the Georgetown Company under existing law. It is a close question as to invalidity of the existing statute, decided by the court of appeals with a dissenting opinion.

It may, then, be too late, as far as capitalization is concerned. What are the further facts? That 10 per cent dividend in outstanding stock is being paid now, and there are outstanding $2,600,000 in certificates of indebtedness, upon which 6 per cent interest is being paid. I have no pride of authorship in this bill, and you can call this anybody's bill you want to. I introduced it Saturday, so that it might be brought up and considered in the House to-day and the House could pass it with such amendments as it sees proper to make.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS. Then, if I understand the gentleman correctly, this bill has never been considered by any committee?

Mr. SIMS. This bill as introduced has not been considered by any committee; but it is a composite bill, and embraces all legislation proposed in other bills which have been considered. In other words, the whole subject-matter has been considered.

Mr. JENKINS. I may not be right, but I think when this gas question was considered before I heard the gentleman from Tennessee make an eloquent speech against permitting this gas company to increase its stock. Am I right in assuming——

Mr. SIMS. To start in——

Mr. JENKINS (continuing). The bill decreases the quality of the gas?

Mr. SIMS. I am not admitting that.

Mr. JENKINS. And then gives the companies power to increase their capital stock?

Mr. SIMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JENKINS. How are people in your district to be benefited by such an act?

Mr. SIMS. I do not suppose the people of my district will be benefited, but I am a member of a committee that is charged with legislation for the District of Columbia, and I think the people of the District of Columbia will be benefited and the stockholders of the Washington and Georgetown gas companies will be benefited.

Mr. JENKINS. Does not the law require them to furnish 24 candlepower in New York, and you put it down to 18 here?

Mr. SIMS. That is water gas. The gentleman says that we had this subject of increasing the capital stock up before, and so we did. But what was that bill? The bill to which the gentleman refers was to authorize the reissue of the stock of the Georgetown and Washington Gaslight companies in a volume that would equal the market price of the stock for a number of days specified in the bill at not to exceed 5 to 1. That would not judicially determine the actual value of the property. It would give an opportunity to thimblerig the market and would enable stock during the period limited—which I think was thirty to ninety days—to be kited to a price that would admit a reissue of stock at 5 to 1 without any evidence before the committee as to the actual value of the property. Now, who blames me for opposition to such a bill as that? If the gentleman will examine my remarks at that time, he will see that I had no objection to issuing the stock, based on the actual value of the property. I have none now and had none then.

Now, when you think of it, we have one street railway here, with 22 miles of double tracks, part overhead trolley, with a stock issue of $12,000,000 and bonds of two and a half millions, and paying 5 per cent on the bonds and 6 per cent on the stock, and another street railway with fifteen millions of stock and fourteen millions of bonds, making $29,000,000 in all, paying 5 per cent on eight and a half millions of preferred stock, in addition to interest on bonds; then take the actual valuation of the street roads, excluding the franchise, and where is the parity? Congress has made fish of one and fowl of another, so far as legislation is concerned. I do not want to authorize the issue of stock in a volume so great as to make it impossible to reduce the price of gas.

This bill does allow gas of 18 candlepower to be made, while the present law requires 22 candlepower, but the present gas supply is 80 per cent water gas; and in coal gas, according to the evidence, you can not make a coal gas higher than 16, 17, or 18 candlepower. If you use coal gas and increase the candlepower above 18, you have to inject oil, and then you get smoke and filth and dust out of all proportion to the increase in illumination; and with 18 candlepower it will be perfectly satisfactory both for heat and light.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MURPHY. Is it not a fact that it appeared in the hearings before the committee that if you make a change from water to coal it will require several millions of capital and require three years before it can be done, and your bill provides for it being done immediately?

Mr. SIMS. That is true. It was claimed that they would have to have an extension of the plant. One of the directors appeared and stated that it would change the entire gas business, but I believe that gentleman did not have information, but said that it would require three years to make the change, at an expense of seven to ten million dollars.

I would not question the accuracy of the statements of these experts unless I knew better; but I do not accept those statements as being absolutely true, because these gentlemen said they had not visited the plant and had made no inspection.

This bill limits to July 1 to supply this kind of gas. If after July 1, 1909, the gas in this city does not have over 10 per cent of carbon monoxide in it, and has 18 candlepower, it will meet the requirements of the bill. I have put the time short because I believe it is possible to do it in that time.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MURPHY. From the hearings before the committee, is it possible to change these plants by the time you have fixed in this bill so as to give us a coal gas?

Mr. SIMS. I believe it is, and I will tell you why I believe it is. The Georgetown Gas Company make all coal gas, and no change is necessary there. The other company makes some coal gas. It is true they only use about 20 per cent of it in the carbureted-water gas, but there has been no evidence to show, as far as I now remember, that they could not make more than 20 per cent.

Mr. MURPHY. Is there not evidence before the committee that the present capacity for making coal gas in the city is not more than 20 per cent of the gas used in the city?

Mr. SIMS. Do you mean the Washington Gaslight Company?

Mr. MURPHY. The total present capacity for manufacturing coal gas in this city?

Mr. SIMS. No.

Mr. MURPHY. That it will not make over 20 per cent of the gas used in the city.

Mr. SIMS. No; you are mistaken about that, because the Georgetown company makes all coal gas. Then, the other company makes 20 per cent coal gas. The hearings show that of the gas furnished by the Washington Gaslight Company 80 per cent is carbureted water and 20 per cent is coal gas. So far as the plant of the Georgetown company is concerned, there is nothing to do to it; it is already a coal-gas plant. So far as the Washington Gaslight Company is concerned, it has only got to increase its capacity beyond 20 per cent in order to begin furnishing this gas on the 1st of July. Now, by running the Georgetown gas plant to its full capacity and running the Washington Gaslight Company's plant to its full capacity for coal, my honest opinion is that they can furnish all the gas needed, beginning the 1st of July, for the reason that there is much less gas used in the summer than in the winter.

I have given the gentleman my reason for changing the candlepower, because you can not change to coal gas and make it above 18 candlepower without injecting oil into it to an extent that makes a smoky flame and damages the hangings of a room.

I do not know what it is going to cost to make this change. The dividends are limited to 6 per cent. So I do not care. I do not mean that I am in favor of an unlimited issue of stock, but I mean I am willing to act without waiting to know. If we do wait to know, there is no telling when we shall get any gas legislation. I do not think it will take three years to make the change.

It appears in one of the Washington papers of Friday or Saturday that the attorney of the gas company said before the Senate committee that the Washington Gaslight Company would comply with whatever legislation we passed, and that they were not in opposition to or attempting to prevent the passage of a bill. I do not think it will take any seven to ten million dollars to make the required change. The dividends are fixed in this bill according to a sliding scale, starting at 6 per cent as a maximum dividend without a decrease in price. Now, we have a provision in the bill that whenever the gas company make more than enough in any one year to pay a 6 per cent dividend, based upon the capitalization, excluding franchises and good will, they may accumulate a surplus, but not above 5 per cent of the par value of the stock. You may have the dividends limited all you please, and if you do not have a surplus limit the gas companies can go on making money and declaring only 6 per cent dividend, and piling up a surplus until the stock is worth 200. But this bill further provides that whenever they reduce the price of gas 1 cent per thousand feet, they may increase the dividend one-twentieth of 1 per cent.

So that the stockholder, not simply the officeholders, of the company will be interested in an economical management and a limited reserve. There will be a tendency to watch expenses and to cut them down, and the inducement to give the cheaper gas is that they get more money as dividends for doing it. This is called the "sliding scale."

We all know that if profits depend upon the cheapness of the products sold, the selfishness of men is sufficient to cause them to care at least for their own pockets, and when by reducing the price of gas 20 cents per thousand feet they can declare a 7 per cent dividend and pay it out, that it will be done, and in order to insure it they are not permitted to have more than 5 per cent of the net par value as surplus.

What are the facts now? Here is a stock issue of $2,600,000 that has never paid less than 10 per cent annual dividend, and outstanding certificates of indebtedness issued for 100 per cent of the par value of the stock—certificates of indebtedness amounting to $2,600,000. Upon that they pay 6 per cent interest. Now add 10 per cent to the 6 per cent and you will get 16 per cent, which they receive. Under my bill, or one similar to it, we will reduce dividends to 6 per cent. Now, what are we going to do about it? Are we going to stand here and fight as we have for the single separate measures? That very fact is cited as the reason why these measures are not taken up by the Senate committee until they are all acted upon by the House.

Why not pass this bill? The subject, as far as the committee is concerned, is fully understood. I do not mean that amendment might not make it better, and if any Member has any amendment to suggest that will improve it, and it so appears to me, I will be glad to accept it.

Suppose we do not pass this bill or any one like it. Suppose the single bills are not acted on at the other end, or are acted on with amendments and get back into this body too late to have a conference, what will be the result? Possibly a new capitalization, which includes the value of the good will and franchise and stock issued upon it, so that we can not reduce the price of gas at all. The carbon-monoxide bill goes without consideration; we will have lost all summer and autumn, and next winter we will be in no better shape than we are to-day, but perhaps worse. Inasmuch as the Georgetown Gas Company and the Washington Gaslight Company will accept the legislation at this session, let us pass the bill and be done with it.

I can not see how it is possible for this bill, or one similar to it, to be an injustice to anybody. It will necessarily automatically work out in the administration so that the result will be an enforced honesty. They must not charge a price above 90 cents. They can not increase dividends without charging less than 90 cents per thousand for the gas. They can not build up a surplus to exceed 5 per cent to be used for the ordinary business purposes.

Mr. Chairman, I have discussed this bill in order that the Members of the House may know what is possible to come before us—either the single measures or a comprehensive measure like the present one.

As I say, I have not the slightest disposition to treat the Committee on the District of Columbia with disrespect. I could not afford to do so if I would, and I would not if I could. For I want to say that every man on that committee, from the chairman down, is a courteous gentleman.

But it does seem to me that the House ought to express itself, first, as to the reduction of carbon monoxide; secondly, as to the limited dividend; third, as to the sliding scale; and, fourth, as to the reduction of price. If the gas company accepts it, the other end of the Capitol will have nothing to do but to pass our bill and be done with it. I am not afraid, as far as that is concerned, that if the Washington Gaslight Company can not furnish the gas required by this bill by the 1st of July, 1909, they will let the Members of the House and the Senate know it. It will be their duty to let us know it. We do not want to pass a bill that it will be impossible for them to comply with. So it makes no difference what the actual cost is, the plant is going to be valued before the improvement is made. This bill requires the petition for valuation to be filed within sixty days after its passage, so that under my bill the valuation of the plant will take place before it is changed from a water to a coal gas plant. Why is it not to the advantage of the people to have it valued now?

My friend and colleague on the committee [Mr. MURPHY] calls attention to the fact that these experts estimate that it will cost seven to ten million dollars to make the change, but under this bill, if it is passed, this valuation must take place before the new construction takes place, so that it makes no difference how much they expend in making the change, as they can not issue stock to cover it unless it is hereafter authorized.

The bond provision is simply the bond provision in the old bill. The section authorizing them to acquire coal lands was incorporated for one purpose only. The gas company here, and all gas companies, seem to be in the hands of two trusts, one the Standard Oil Company and the other the coal trust. If they make water gas, according to the proof, it takes from 4 to 6 gallons of oil to bring it up to the candlepower required here. It takes only one and a half to two gallons to bring up coal gas to 22 candlepower, but it will not take any to make it 18 candlepower. Let us get the people out from between these two trusts, and let them make a coal gas which will not average over from 5 to 7 per cent of carbon monoxide, which, according to the experts, is not one-fifth as dangerous as the other, and do it without increasing the stock to a volume that must necessarily follow if the bill repealing section 5 of the act of 1896 is not passed, or one having a similar effect, if the Supreme Court reverses the court of appeals.

I have no object in advocating this bill, except to get action at the present Congress, that secures so much that is desirable and removes so much that is objectionable. Summer is near, and if this bill passes they will get to work right away, and it will be all done when we get back here next winter. Defeat this bill and it is probable we will have no legislation until next winter, and in the winter time you can not do this work as expeditiously as in the summer. Such a course will put it off for two years, or else we must settle down to the idea that we are going to use water gas in the District of Columbia, made as good, according to the hearings, as it can be, but which, according to the evidence of the experts of the Government, the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry and his associates, ought to be absolutely prohibited. I hope there will be no objection when we get into the House to asking that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be taken up this afternoon and passed in some form, and so go to the other body, and let that body act upon it, because if we go into further hearings, testimony in chief and testimony in rebuttal, nobody knows where it will end; but I think the prospects of legislation on any of these propositions at this session of Congress will fail if something is not done, and done immediately, without waiting for further hearings.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on the District, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], to whom these franchises in the bill before the committee are to be granted?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is hardly in the nature of a franchise. The Washington Market Company is to have a license, the privilege of building that track.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is it not a franchise when you cross a street?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is over the street.

Mr. DRISCOLL. You have two propositions here, one to build a railroad track across a public street——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Over it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Well, it does not make any difference whether it is overhead or underground.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It makes a great deal of difference whether it is laid across at grade or above.

Mr. DRISCOLL. It gives the right, to some extent, to interrupt the free use of the street.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Of course, if you were coming along with a procession, with banners and flags, you might have to lower them, but, so far as that portion of the city is concerned, I do not think it would impede the street.

Mr. DRISCOLL. In the second place, you are granting a franchise to somebody to establish a conduit from this particular block or square across Water street and down Water street to the Potomac River.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is that a franchise?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should regard it in the nature of a license. It is revocable by the commissioners.

Mr. DRISCOLL. All of the franchises that we grant here are revocable, or practically so. It seems to me this is a franchise.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What can be the objection to allowing this company to take the water they desire to use in this case from the river, only 200 feet away?

Mr. DRISCOLL. The question I am asking now is, To whom or to what corporation or concern are these granted?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Washington Market Company.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, I have known something about this from previous legislation. The Washington Market Company, owning the market down here, some years ago asked leave to establish an ice-manufacturing plant anywhere in the District, and I objected to the consideration of the bill, which is the reason I know anything about it.

The Washington Market Company under an act of Congress did not have authority to manufacture ice, and it desired to manufacture ice both for use in the market and for sale. It wished a large amount of ice for its own use in the market and wished to furnish ice to the people using their market at a lower rate than they could purchase it elsewhere, and afterwards they came before Congress and asked for a license to manufacture ice upon this one square——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Three twenty-eight.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Down near the river, which authority was granted to them. They now, as shown by this bill, desire an opportunity to connect with the river so that they may obtain their water easier and so they may have connection with the railroad tracks, and I take it if they obtain this authority the result in the end will be to somewhat reduce the cost of ice both for the market and in the District, because it will decrease the cost of manufacture.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The question I asked was, To whom does this license, if you please to call it a license, go?

Mr. MANN. This is the Washington Market Company, incorporated by act of Congress.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Why does it not say so?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It does say so.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Where?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very plainly.

Mr. MADDEN. It does not say so in the bill.

Mr. DRISCOLL. It simply grants a permit to certain persons; I do not know whom.

Mr. MANN. Of course that probably ought to be in the bill, but the act of Congress to which it refers was an act of Congress granting to the Washington Market Company authority to establish an ice-manufacturing plant on this square.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I call the gentleman's attention to the act named in the report. An act was approved February 1, 1907, authorizing the Washington Market Company to conduct a cold-storage business and manufacture ice on square 328, and you will see on the first page of the report it refers to that act and to the Washington Market Company.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I am not talking about the report, but does the report refer to the statute?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The bill reported refers to the act.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me it would be well to amend the bill by inserting, after the word "permits," on page 1, line 7, the words "Washington Market Company."

Mr. DRISCOLL. I make that amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I do not consider it necessary, but I have no objection, because it is referred to here. Will the gentleman state his amendment again?

Mr. MANN. After the word "permits," in line 7, page 1, add the words "Washington Market Company."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I accept the amendment.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Does that apply to this permit?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill on page 2 by adding, after the word "prescribed," in line 12, the words——

Mr. DRISCOLL. I ask that the other amendment offered be considered first.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It has been accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York to yield the floor.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes; but has that amendment been adopted?

Mr. MANN. The amendment I suggested was after the word "permits"——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offered an amendment, but the gentleman from Illinois did not have the floor; the gentleman from New York had the floor.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Illinois did not offer the amendment, but suggested the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send the amendment to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "permits," insert the words "Washington Market Company."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That should be "to the Washington Market Company."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill by adding, on page 2, line 12, after the word "prescribed," the words "and remove whenever said commissioners shall so order." It simply gives them the right of supervision and——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 12, after the word "prescribed," insert "and remove whenever the said commissioners shall so order."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no interest in the matter, but will the gentleman give the authority of Congress to erect an overhead track and permit the commissioners to order its removal?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Well, I would not do that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If I may be permitted, I will state that I have had experience a good many times in regard to measures of this sort. You grant to a private corporation the right to build a railroad across a street on the theory that for the present it is no inconvenience to the public use of the street, and it soon becomes a vested right, and when it obviously becomes an impediment to travel you can not get it away. This bill, if you will notice, provides on page 2, "that for purposes of said overhead track no present grades of Twelfth street shall be disturbed"——

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Section 2 of this act provides "that Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act." If at any time this overhead crossing becomes a menace, why give this right to the commissioners? Why can not Congress have it removed?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The right to remove this track should be given to the commissioners.

Mr. MANN. All the right the commissioners have is to specify the particular location; and yet the gentleman proposes, in addition to that, to authorize the commissioners to exercise legislative authority and repeal this act.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman give his attention for a moment?

Mr. MANN. I always give attention to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The act says, on page 2:

That the overhead track and the conduit and pipes hereby authorized shall be located as may be directed by the said Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and be laid and maintained under their inspection in such location as they may prescribe.

In other words, the whole matter, even the maintenance of these tracks, is within the purview of the commissioners, they being the people who are apt to give the matter attention. Now, I submit that it would be wise to also give them the right to remove these tracks whenever they may so direct.

Mr. MANN. You might just as well give them authority to grant the right to lay tracks.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is what the act does.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. Congress gives the right to put the tracks and the conduit in, and merely gives to the commissioners the authority that is always given to some executive officer to control the maintenance, the inspection, and the location, unless the location is specifically named by Congress. The gentleman would give to the commissioners authority to repeal the act and to hold up the company if they wished to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the gentleman insist that this bill requires the commissioners to permit this to be done?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The gentleman is mistaken. The language is:

That they are hereby authorized to issue a permit.

Mr. MANN. That means that they are required to do so.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Not at all. They do it at their discretion.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. The only discretion the commissioners have under such language as that is to determine as to the terms of the permit, the place of location, and matters of that kind. Where Congress authorizes an executive officer to do a certain thing, without putting in the words "in his discretion," it is just as much a command to him as though they said, "You shall do so and so." That is a well-recognized construction of statutes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. When the gentleman gets through I will answer him. I do not wish to carry on a colloquy with him in which he will have the advantage of long experience over me. There is no statute in the world which "authorizes" a board of commissioners to issue certain permits which a court would construe as requiring them to issue permits. I speak of a case where a board, as in this instance, is authorized by Congress to issue certain permits. They ought to be, in the ordinary defense of the public against this thing becoming a vested interest—they ought to be in a position to require its removal. The discretion in one case ought to be exercised just as in the other. And I have seen over and over again, in thirty-odd years of practice, where a license grows into a vested right, which becomes a nuisance in the course of time, and which can not be remedied simply for lack of some perspicacity and lack of prevision when the act was passed.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is immaterial to me whether this bill passes or not; but I regard it as quite essential, if it does pass, that it be in proper form. The gentleman, who has had a wide experience, says that to authorize an executive officer to do something means nothing if this executive officer chooses. I venture to say, based on my experience of legislation here, that if this bill, or any other bill, passes authorizing the commissioners to do a certain act, stating it, and leaving it to their discretion, and they refuse any permit without giving reasons for it, refusing to issue the permit, except based upon the method of inspection and method of construction, that the court would mandamus them and require them to issue the permit. Hence it is universally the rule in Congress, where you give discretion to an executive officer to do a certain thing and do not wish to require him to do it, you must put in the words, "in his discretion."

You will find in the language of all such bills where a discretion is given and you do not require him to do a certain thing, the words "in his discretion" are inserted. Of course I suppose the gentleman thinks that in putting in these words Congress adds them for amusement; that it does not mean anything. But I assure the gentleman Congress does not add the words for amusement about discretion to do or not to do, as he will ascertain in time. When Congress authorizes the Secretary of War to do a certain thing, and puts in the words "in his discretion," he is required to do that thing upon application within the limitations as to discretion which are given him by the bill; and in this case, if this bill passes in the way that it is, the commissioners can exercise a discretion as to the method of construction, as to the place of location, and they would have a discretion to exercise legislative authority, as the gentleman would assume.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not assume so, and the gentleman insists that I do not know what I am talking about, and the gentleman is very apt to take that view about anybody who disagrees with him.

Mr. MANN. I have always found, Mr. Chairman, that men when bested in argument abuse the other side.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Not at all; I am only appealing for courtesy.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will take his seat—I have the floor—I am perfectly respectful in what I say.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the gentleman objects, will he yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman objects I will try to amend it. And I will yield to a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The question is this: What right has the gentleman from Illinois to speak about what is in my mind and what I have not expressed, and to attribute to me opinions on matters of law and otherwise which he has no right to attribute?

Mr. MANN. I do not attribute any opinions to the gentleman at all. He himself gave it, and I agreed in his opinion, and what I was saying, and I did so with deference to the gentleman, was to put my opinion with his, and I yielded to him that point.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to put that language in the bill will make it, in my opinion, ridiculous. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, may the amendment be read again? I did not hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 20.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment, at the end of line 15, after the word "granted."

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 15, page 2, insert: "Provided, That the Washington Market Company shall be required to pay for the privilege herein granted the sum of $500 per annum.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I think this bill ought not to pass. Arguments are made every day of the great need for doing something to make Washington more beautiful. In the face of these arguments the committee representing the District of Columbia comes in here with a bill proposing to permit the construction of an overhead railway across one of the principal streets in the city.

It seems to me that this is one of the things that ought not to be permitted under any circumstances. It is only a short time since the Congress enacted a law to eliminate grade crossings, to compel the removal of the tracks from grade, to compel the removal of the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway Company and the Pennsylvania and other railway companies to the point where the Union Station is now located. In the enactment of this law it was provided that $3,000,000 should be paid to those railway companies by the Government of the United States. In addition to this $3,000,000, one or two more million dollars have since been paid, both for property damages and for filling streets and eliminating grade crossings. In the face of that we are asked to-day to enact a law to destroy the very thing for which such a vast sum of money has been paid. If, however, the House believes that the bill should pass, then some compensation should be paid for the privilege granted. The people who seek this privilege are seeking it because they believe it will aid them in the conduct of their business. This is a private enterprise. This bill seeks to facilitate the private business of a private corporation. The construction of this track, if the bill passes, will help this company to produce its wares for less money perhaps than it is now able to produce them. If that be true, there ought to be some compensation, and I submit that $500 per annum is a very small compensation for the privilege granted.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman also considered the fact that this bill also grants to this company authority to obtain water from the Potomac River free, which ought to be worth more than $500 a year to them?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; to-day they are obliged to pay for the water they use. The city of Washington has a water plant from which it derives a large revenue, and this company ought not to be relieved from the payment of the regular fees for water used any more than any private individual should be. So I say that although I have placed the figure at $500, that is merely a guess. It certainly ought to be worth more, and I shall be glad to see some gentleman move to amend by doubling the amount.

Mr. MANN. It ought to be a thousand dollars at least.

Mr. FOSTER of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CURRIER). The gentleman from Indiana offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 14, after the word "work," insert "together with a reasonable annual compensation for the privilege herein conferred, to be determined by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, subject to such revision as they may from time to time determine;" and on page 2, line 15, after the word "granted," strike out the period and add: "And on default of the payment of any such compensation determined by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the privilege herein granted shall immediately determine and the overhead track and conduit and pipes be removed."

Mr. MADDEN. I submit that is not a substitute for the amendment offered by me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. FOSTER of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the bill——

Mr. MANN. A point of order. There is an amendment pending, offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], to amend one portion of the bill. Now an amendment comes in to amend another portion of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not examined the amendment, but will do so.

Mr. FOSTER of Indiana. I raise the point of order that the point of order is made too late. I have been trying to talk on the proposition.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has been trying to, but he has not.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CURRIER). While the Chair recognized the gentleman from Indiana, debate had not begun so as to prevent the point of order being raised.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's amendment can come in later.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] adds a provision at the end of line 15, on page 2. The proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FOSTER] adds a provision to line 14, on page 2, and a further provision after line 15, on page 2. The Chair does not think it is a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois; but, of course, it can be offered by the gentleman from Indiana as an amendment after the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois has been disposed of.

Mr. MADDEN. I move an amendment to my amendment, making it $1,000 instead of $500.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out five hundred and insert one thousand.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that if you are to make a charge for this license, or permit, or franchise, it ought to be at least a thousand dollars; but I further agree with some of the gentlemen here that this bill ought never to pass. I think it will for two reasons. First, it will be an unseemly looking construction down there in one of the main streets next to the post-office building.

Mr. MANN. Oh, it is not there at all.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Where is it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is down by the Potomac River.

Mr. MANN. It has no connection with the market as it is now situated.

Mr. KAHN. It is way down next to the Potomac River.

Mr. MANN. This is to permit them to get from the site they have purchased to the railroad grounds. It is not proposed to build an overhead track to the market—no one would favor that.

Mr. DRISCOLL. That is what I thought you were getting at.

Mr. MANN. It is no conspicuous street; it does no harm to anybody.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I stated some time ago that it was in a portion of the city where there could not be the slightest objection to it. The gentleman himself, if he could see it, would not have the slightest objection.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Where is the Washington Market?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Down near Pennsylvania avenue. This is square 328, which the Washington Market has purchased, down next to the Potomac River, in a place that will be devoted almost exclusively to a manufacturing center and where the railroad terminals are.

Mr. NORRIS. Why could not the company use water without this franchise?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They can; but for the purpose as stated here, I can not see any objection to letting them put a conduit under the street and getting it into their plant.

Mr. NORRIS. What is going over the street?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The overhead tracks, 14 feet above the street.

Mr. KAHN. It is in the nature of a spur track.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand it, there is a concession to be given to this company for two purposes; one is to get the water from the river and the other is to build a railroad, or an overhead track.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To extend a railroad over Twelfth street from one square to another.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the necessity of the railroad going over the street?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To get supplies into the plant. They have not built there yet; they have acquired square numbered 328, and this is to transport whatever they desire in their business into their plant. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a suggestion to the mover of this amendment. I do not want to discuss the question, but I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he will make his amendment more complete by providing that the thousand dollars shall be paid one half to the city of Washington and the other half into the Treasury of the United States. This I do upon the idea that this franchise, for it is such, will affect in some way the city. We pay one-half of the taxes and one-half of the expenses of improvements, and the Treasury of the United States should receive one-half of this license tax, if it may be so called. In that way it will be more equitable.

Mr. MADDEN. I will suggest that the Clerk modify the text of the amendment so as to make it read as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MANN. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the language should read:

Paid into the Treasury of the United States one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia and one-half to the credit of miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. KEIFER. I have no objection to the form of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be modified in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, and the Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "annum" the words "to be paid into the Treasury of the United States one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia and one-half to miscellaneous receipts."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that that takes the place of both amendments offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask that the amendment be reported in full as completed.

The CHAIRMAN. As just reported it did not include the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois making the sum $1,000. Without objection, it will be so modified, and the Clerk will report the amendment as it will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Washington Market Company shall be required to pay for the privileges herein granted the sum of $1,000 per annum, to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, one-half to be credited to the District of Columbia and one-half to be credited to miscellaneous receipts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I heard read a few moments ago the amendment offered by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FOSTER]; and if this bill be amended at all, in my judgment his amendment should prevail. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] in offering the amendment to this section first makes the figure $500 per annum, and without consultation as to whether that is too much or too little, he arises and arbitrarily makes it $1,000 per annum. He does not know whether it is worth $1,000. It may be worth $2,000, or it may be worth $3,000 or $5,000, or it may be worth nothing at all. Therefore I think the better plan would be to adopt the amendment giving the Commissioners of the District of Columbia authority to fix the price from time to time. For that reason I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman wish to leave the bill in as indefinite a state as his suggestion would indicate?

Mr. KAHN. I think it would be very much better to leave it to the Commissioners of the District to fix the rental, because after all the figure he suggests is in the nature of an annual rental.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman say to the House that he would like to have the Commissioners of the District legislate for Congress?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think that is legislating. That is simply fixing the rental. If you fix the rental now at a thousand dollars, possibly in two or three years from now that franchise will become very valuable, and the privilege it grants might be worth five times that amount. Unless somebody should take the trouble to introduce a bill the market company would be having that privilege for $1,000. On the other hand, the commissioners would keep in touch with conditions in the District, and under the amendment suggested by my colleague from Indiana [Mr. FOSTER] they could change from time to time the annual rental as conditions warranted.

Mr. MADDEN. If the House accepted the report of the Committee on the District of Columbia, it would have given the franchise without any compensation whatever. It may do that as it is.

Mr. KAHN. The franchise may not be worth very much at the present time.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, if it is not worth very much, and it is assumed that $1,000 is not as much as they ought to pay, make it more.

Mr. KAHN. It may be too much.

Mr. MADDEN. That the franchise may become so valuable it will be worth a great deal more, then I am perfectly willing to have the sum increased to any figure the gentleman thinks ought to be embodied in the amendment; but I do think this bill should not pass without indicating how much should be paid as the initial sum; and if later it is shown that this franchise is much more valuable than we now think it is, and if I am here as a Member of the House, I will be very glad to join the gentleman in increasing the sum to any figure he may name beyond what is now indicated in the amendment. I do not think this House should vote to embody an amendment in the bill providing for an indefinite compensation. We are granting a very great privilege here——

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is speaking in my time, but I will ask him a question.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, I thought the gentleman wanted some information. [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. Has the gentleman made any investigation whatever to indicate that a thousand dollars per annum is a reasonable price?

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to say to the gentleman that I stated in the beginning that I was not sure whether $500 or $1,000 was what ought to be paid.

Mr. KAHN. Then is not it safe to leave it in the hands of the commissioners, who would investigate the matter?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the committee having charge of the bill might well have come to the House with information as to the value of the franchise. They might well have been able to tell the House how valuable this is. They might well have ascertained what the value of the franchise was; how much ought to be paid. They might have recommended to the House what should be paid by the Washington Market Company. They did not do that; and in consequence of their failure to do it somebody ought to suggest it. Somebody has suggested it; and now I hope these gentlemen who failed to ascertain how valuable the franchise is will be willing to submit to a reasonable compensation being paid by the concern to whom this valuable franchise is about to be granted.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. ADAIR. Does the gentleman know what, if any, rental has been paid?

Mr. MADDEN. They have not paid any rental. There has been no privilege up to this time. We are seeking to grant a privilege now upon which we expect to collect rent.

Mr. ADAIR. Have they been occupying this ground without paying anything?

Mr. MADDEN. They own the ground.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to take the floor in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question with regard to the franchises that the Washington Market Company now have and the rentals they now pay. Statements I have heard with regard to the status of that corporation in its relations to the property owned by the United States would indicate that this kind of legislation which we are now indulging in is not wise.

Nobody seems to have any conception of the value of the franchise that is being conferred. No one seems to know what sum ought to be paid. I submit that there has been legislation of that kind heretofore with regard to this company. I have asked certain gentlemen as to some of the relations of this company and have been told that they occupy valuable land, an entire block in this city, for which they pay a comparatively insignificant sum. I have heard other gentlemen say that they were without any rights, that they were mere squatters, occupying valuable lands of the United States at mere sufferance for which they paid a mere song. Now, in view of those various statements, it seems to me that we ought not to extend our relations with that corporation upon the vague, uncertain information the gentlemen seem to have; that we ought to stop until somebody knows something or other about what we are doing, what it is worth, what ought to be paid for it. I think those are important inquiries, and I would like the gentleman to tell us what are the relations in fact of this company to the Government, what lands, what property they already occupy, what they do pay, and what the duration of their rights are. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I rose for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Iowa a question, but instead of putting my idea in the shape of a question I will myself state it. I agree with him very thoroughly in what he has said. I think it would be a good idea to recommit this bill to the committee with instructions to inquire and report back to the House as to what would be a fair annual payment to make for the license and privileges given in it. I would like to see the committee instructed at the same time to inquire and report back to the House whether or not this company has any title to the land now occupied by it upon the corner of Pennsylvania avenue and Sixth street; if it has any, what its title is, and whether or not that property is or is not the property of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say as a member of the committee I would be very glad to have the bill recommitted that we may get the fullest information, so that the House may have that information upon all these matters.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, is it in order to move to recommit the bill with the instructions suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OVERSTREET). The House is acting in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and it can make a motion recommending that.

Mr. KEIFER. I make that motion, that the bill be reported back to the House with the recommendation that the bill be recommitted and that the committee be instructed to make such inquiries and report back to the House.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be laid aside for the present and ask to call up another bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that he be a little more particular in regard to those instructions, and that he make them so full that there can be a complete exposé of all the relations of that corporation to the Government and the property.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the instructions being made as particular as possible. I am under the impression that if we recommend it be reported back to the House with the recommendation that it be recommitted, that at the time of the recommital we could make the instructions just as specific as the gentleman from Iowa or the gentleman from Mississippi might desire in all those respects; therefore I make my motion now to recommend to the House that the bill be recommitted to the committee with instructions.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is to lay the bill aside with the recommendation to the House that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia——

Mr. KEIFER. With instructions.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of a motion incorporating specific instructions, the Chair could not entertain the motion simply to recommit with instructions. There have been no instructions submitted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the gentleman from Michigan, the chairman of the committee, made the motion that the bill be laid aside with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and that is the motion that is now pending.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] that the bill ought to be recommitted with specific instructions.

Mr. KEIFER. That can be done when we get into the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Chair rules that it can not be done.

Mr. KEIFER. I did not so understand it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the Chair to rule that if we get back into the House after the committee has passed a resolution merely recommending "that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia," it would be too late then to move that it be "recommitted with instructions," because of the well-known parliamentary rule that a general motion to recommit takes precedence of a motion to recommit with instructions.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will say to the gentleman, as chairman of the committee, that of course this raises a question that is not in the bill. I think the committee now understand the character of the information that the House would like, and I can assure the gentleman that the committe will get the fullest information.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That assurance is perfectly satisfactory to me, as far as I am concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not rule that a motion to recommit with instructions would not be in order. The Chair stated that no one had made a motion to recommit with specific instructions. The motion pending before the committee is to lay this bill aside with a recommendation to the House that it be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it will hurt anything to lay the bill over, but if the House proposes to wait until the Committee on the District of Columbia has time to investigate the right of the Washington Market Company on the ground that it now occupies down there and all the litigation and legislation which has been had on that subject, they will have to wait until after this Congress expires.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We can get the information that has been suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may be able to get it quickly. I spent several weeks on the matter when this first came before the House years ago, and I assure the gentlemen that I only scratched the surface of the information. I spent more time on it than the District Committee will have between now and the end of the session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to recommit the bill——

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment, as follows:

Be recommitted with instructions to inquire into the relations of the Washington Market Company to the United States and to any real estate owned by the United States and occupied by said company, the franchises of said company, and the rentals paid by said company.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I would suggest:

A fair annual rental of the privileges proposed to be granted by this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

With instructions to inquire into the relations of the Washington Market Company to the United States and to any real estate owned by the United States and occupied by said company, the franchises of said company, and the rentals paid by said company to the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion as amended to lay the bill aside with a recommendation that it be recommitted with the instructions just read.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FOSTER of Vermont having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is with deep regret and profound sorrow that the Senate has heard the announcement of the death of Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON, late a Senator from the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay fitting tribute to his high character and distinguished services.

Resolved, That the Secretary transmit to the family of the deceased a copy of these resolutions, with the action of the Senate thereon.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

VETERAN VOLUNTEER FIREMEN'S ASSOCIATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 27667.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 27667) to amend an act authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to grant to the Veteran Volunteer Firemen's Association use of certain property in the city of Washington, approved March 2, 1891.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act authorizing the commissioners to grant to the Veteran Volunteer Firemen's Association use of certain property in the city of Washington," approved March 2, 1891, be amended so as to include both the Veteran Volunteer Firemen's Association and the Association of Oldest Inhabitants of the District of Columbia in the use of all that part of lot 11, in square No. 141, in the city of Washington, and building thereon, occupied by a house used formerly as an engine house, and described as follows: Beginning at the northwest corner of said lot and running east 30 feet on H street, thence 50 feet south on a line parallel to Nineteenth street, thence west 30 feet to Nineteenth street, and thence north 50 feet to the beginning; the same to be used by said associations as a place of meeting and for the storage of their property and belongings, consisting of fire apparatus, books, maps, pictures, files, souvenirs, mementos, and papers of historic interest, the same to continue during the pleasure of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, this is identically the same bill that was passed two weeks ago, with the exception that on page 2, line 2, it should have read "northeast" instead of "northwest."

Mr. CAMPBELL. What is the reading now?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It reads, "Beginning at the northwest." It passed reading "northeast."

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman, as the matter is now before us, what is the reason for the Government giving to volunteer organizations here a piece of government property perpetually, practically?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who has charge of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to give to the Oldest Inhabitants' Association the right to occupy a little house down on the river front that was at one time used as an engine house by the volunteer fire company here. The volunteer fire company has been granted by Congress the right to occupy that old building as a sort of meeting place and to use it as a place for keeping such relics of the Volunteer Fireman's Association as have been preserved, and the building is now being used as a sort of museum for those old relics. When the matter was up two weeks ago and was passed by the House an error crept into the language of the bill, in which the description of the property was given as the "northeast corner" instead of the "northwest corner" of the property described. The purpose of giving the privilege to the Oldest Inhabitants' Association now is that the relics be preserved.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How long is it to be given them?

Mr. CAMPBELL. During the will of the commissioners.

Mr. MANN. Well, is it during the will of the commissioners or for all time?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is "at the pleasure of the commissioners."

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the exact language of the bill?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Lines 10 and 11, "during the pleasure of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers the amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add a new section, to read:

"SEC. 2. Congress reserves the right to alter, repeal, or amend this act."

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We accept the amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I offered that amendment, and was writing it the last time that the matter was up, and the gentleman would not accept it.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentlemen both know I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York was recognized to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Chairman, amendments are not in order. I had the floor in general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Kansas took the floor in his own right.

Mr. MANN. He took the floor simply to answer a question of mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I wished to obtain information if I could. Mr. Chairman, originally there was a volunteer fire company here in Washington. It was thought a desirable thing to let the remnant of that company occupy a certain piece of land belonging to the District. It was a very proper and rightful thing to do.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment? Mr. Chairman, I took the gentleman's time to explain to him just why it was that this cession was made to the fire company in the first place, and why it was desired to make it to the Oldest Inhabitants' Association now. The gentleman was giving his attention to a more interesting conversation indulged in by other parties.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. While other people were talking to me I was listening to the gentleman from Kansas.

Now, that was a very proper thing to do. Here was an organization of a volunteer fire department, who had done good service. I can see why they should be given the use of a public building, but how can the gentleman differentiate between the Oldest Inhabitants' Association and the youngest inhabitants' association? How shall we say we give the use of this building to the Oldest Inhabitants' Association and not give it to the youngest inhabitants' association, to the Masonic association, to the Odd Fellows' association, or any other private association of the District? Has it come to the pass that we propose to furnish for all of these associations government buildings for their use while we are paying rent for the use of government offices? It seems to me a queer proposition. When this first authority was given to the Veteran Volunteer Firemen's Association, of course every one knew that in course of time it would cease to exist. The men would disappear; there were no new ones coming in, but there is no end to the Oldest Inhabitants' Association.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MANN. Now, upon what theory can we start in and give away property of the Government to an association that is not to end? Now, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest that the oldest inhabitant anywhere never dies.

Mr. MANN. That is correct. That is a perennial organization, whereas the veteran firemen's organization will disappear and the organization die. But the Oldest Inhabitants' Association will not die, and when any kind of an organization gets its nose in anywhere, and gets hold of public property, then it works a committee of Congress, or works the House, or somebody else for permanent possession of it. If you commence, if you open the door by a crack, it means in the end everlasting possession, and that is the theory upon which this bill is based.

Mr. SIMS. Does my friend regard this as an opening? Has the gentleman not seen here often——

Mr. MANN. The opening was when we gave authority to the Volunteer Firemen's Association to meet once a week in a certain building. Now they want the building given to somebody else because of that.

Mr. SIMS. Has the gentleman ever known the people of this District, old or young, rich or poor, to use their own property for anything when they could get Congress to give the use of public property?

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Tennessee, as well as myself, has a great deal of regard and respect for the people of the District of Columbia. While we often say mean things about their lack of civic pride, yet, after all, I think, under the circumstances, they do exceedingly well, both about themselves and about working Congress.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman has not pointed out any instance in which they have used their own property where they could get public property in place of it. I should like to have the gentleman give an instance, either manifesting civic pride or any other kind of pride.

Mr. MANN. I do not believe in giving away public property merely because somebody asks for it.

Mr. SIMS. We are doing this simply in line with long-established precedent; not as to this specific building, but similar things. Down on Lafayette square we, by authority of Congress, are allowing gentlemen to erect large platforms or grand stands for people to use on public property and view a public parade, and for which they must pay a private committee for the use of those seats erected on public property.

Mr. MANN. That is true; somebody pays for that. But, on the other hand, we are also building, out here on the east side of the Capitol, at public expense, a platform upon which the gentleman and myself and other Members of this House will sit without paying anything.

Mr. SIMS. But there is not room for everybody who wants to see the parade to sit there; but we give a private committee here the privilege of using public property for which they ask money, and by which they bring thousands of people to the District of Columbia for the purpose of making money out of those people. I tell you it is not all civic pride. There is some real hard cash consideration at the bottom of these things. That does not apply to this particular bill, however.

Mr. MANN. If I should divert from this particular bill, which I do not wish to do, I might say to the gentleman that I have had times when I thought I might subscribe $100,000 toward the expenses of the inaugural ceremonies here, knowing perfectly well that it would be a big advertisement and no expense to me.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I wish to be recognized to offer the amendment which I wanted to offer a while ago.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OVERSTREET). The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act."

Mr. DRISCOLL. When the bill was before the committee for consideration the other time, I tried to offer such an amendment, but it was passed before I got to it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let us have a vote on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 19, noes 27.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I call for tellers.

Tellers were refused, 14 Members, not a sufficient number, rising in support of the demand.

Accordingly, the motion of Mr. CAMPBELL was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 25149) to authorize certain changes in the permanent system of highways in the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to prepare a new highway plan for that portion of the District of Columbia lying north of Evarts street north, east of North Capitol street, south of Michigan avenue, and west of Glenwood Cemetery, under the provisions contained in the act of Congress approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," and an amendment to said act approved June 28, 1898; that upon the completion and recording of said new highway plan it shall take the place of, and stand for, any previous plan for said portion of the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Add at the end of line 3, page 2, the words "and that the portion of the highway thereby abandoned shall revert to the abutting owners."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

AMENDING ACT TO WIDEN BLADENSBURG ROAD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (S. 6580) to amend an act entitled "An act for the widening of Bladensburg road, and for other purposes," approved January 9, 1907.

SEC. 2. That the limitation of thirty days after the date of dedication within which condemnation proceedings are directed to be instituted for the widening of said Bladensburg road be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

EXTENSIONS OF CITY AND SUBURBAN RAILWAY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill (H. R. 20837) to authorize certain extensions of the City and Suburban Railway of Washington, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the City and Suburban Railway of Washington be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to remove its double tracks from Michigan avenue from the intersection thereof with Monroe street NE. eastwardly to the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and to extend its double tracks on Monroe street NE. eastwardly from said intersection and over the Monroe Street Bridge to Twelfth street NE.; thence on Twelfth street northwardly to the Bunker Hill road, and thence northwardly on such street or road as may be designated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to the intersection of such street or road with the boundary line of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That the removal of existing tracks east of the intersection of Monroe street and Michigan avenue and the extension of the new double tracks on Monroe street as far as Twelfth street NE., as provided for in section 1 of this act, shall be completed within six months from the date of the granting of a permit therefor by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; that the construction of that portion of the extension from Twelfth and Monroe streets to the Bunker Hill road, as provided for in section 1 of this act, shall be commenced within six months from the date of the granting of a permit therefor by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and completed within six months from the commencement of construction operations; that the construction of that portion of the extension from the Bunker Hill road to the District line, provided for in section 1 of this act, shall be commenced within six months from the date of the granting of a permit therefor by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and completed within one year from the commencement of construction operations; that the cost of widening the roadway of Monroe street NE. between Tenth and Twelfth streets, to make the same 40 feet wide from curb to curb, shall be paid by the City and Suburban Railway of Washington; and in default of such commencements and completions within the several periods specified in this section all rights, franchises, and privileges granted by this and the preceding section of this act shall, with respect to the defaulted portions of the route or routes, cease and determine.

SEC. 3. That the City and Suburban Railway of Washington shall have, over and respecting the routes herein provided for, the same rights, powers, and privileges as it has and hereafter may have by law over and respecting its other routes, and shall be subject in respect thereto to all the other provisions of its charters and of law.

SEC. 4. That the City and Suburban Railway of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized to operate over its tracks cars for the conveyance of parcels, milk, ice, light freight, and of fuel for the use of such company.

The following committee amendments were read:

Strike out section 3, page 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following, to stand as section 3:

"SEC. 3. That the said City and Suburban Railway of Washington shall have over and respecting the routes herein provided for the same rights, powers, privileges, duties, and obligations as it has and hereafter may have by law over and respecting its present route, and shall be subject in respect thereto to all the other provisions of its charter and of law."

Add in line 13, page 3, after the word "company," the following proviso:

"Provided, That such cars shall be operated only during the hours between 12 o'clock midnight and 5 o'clock a. m., and shall be subject to such regulations as may be made by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia."

Add to the end of the bill the following, to stand as sections 5 and 6:

"SEC. 5. All laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions hereof are hereby repealed.

"SEC. 6. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what rights this company now has in the District of Columbia?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They are a part of the Washington Railway and Electric Company, one of the six or seven companies that constitute that company.

Mr. MADDEN. Why is not there a provision in the bill calling for regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, as was incorporated in previous bills?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not think that in a bill of this kind there is any necessity for such a provision.

Mr. MADDEN. If there was necessity for regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission in bills previously passed, I see no reason why the same provision should not be incorporated in this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There was a bill passed in the last session of Congress under the twentieth section of which this road is subject to the regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission. All this bill provides for, so far as the change in tracks is concerned, is that they may be changed so that they will not cross the Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio, but go underneath on another piece of road in Brookland, over which the Government has built a bridge.

Mr. MADDEN. How many miles of track does this franchise permit?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In my judgment, it is not 1 mile. It takes up a little piece of track in the township of Brookland that extends up to, as I say, the tracks of the Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, where, according to the report of the commissioners, eight or nine people have already been killed. The citizens put their hands in their own pockets and bought an additional street, or right of way, over which they ask these tracks to run and to run under the bridge at Brookland.

Mr. MADDEN. Is that all it permits, to go under the Baltimore and Ohio?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It asks the privilege of going on the changed street, and in going there it will go under the bridge.

Mr. MADDEN. The tracks are there now?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; but we desire to take them up. They now end at the Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

Mr. MADDEN. You are not granting any new privileges?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. MADDEN. Do you cross any land owned by the Government of the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; it is a new street over which the tracks are asked to be placed, and has been bought and paid for by the citizens of Brookland. They ask to have these tracks taken up and changed over, and when they are changed they will go under the new bridge.

Mr. MADDEN. If there is any damage——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is no damage.

Mr. MADDEN (continuing). Resulting from the widening of the roadway provided in this bill——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They have bought the roadway themselves.

Mr. MADDEN. But I wish to know, if there is any damage to abutting property as a result of the widening of the roadway, who pays it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The people of Brookland have already bought it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is no provision in this bill for the payment of it by anybody. They bought the strip themselves.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MANN. We have had a number of these bills before us at different times. Is this one of the bills that we have had heretofore?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; this has never been up before the House.

Mr. MANN. We had a bill of this kind up at the last session, I think.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. MANN. To let some company bring in milk.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There may have been a provision in some other bill with reference to these sections.

Mr. MANN. We have had up here since I have been in the House, three or four different times I should say, bills for the purpose of permitting this company, or some other company in this locality, to bring milk into the city. We have amended those bills. I think on some occasions we have recommitted them to the gentleman's committee. What I wish to ascertain is whether, in reporting this bill, the committee has paid any attention to the amendments which have been made in the Committee of the Whole when we had these bills under consideration?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not recall that any of them were ever recommitted.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman's committee, in reporting this bill, considered the frame of the bills that have already been disposed of by Congress or recommitted, as to the form of the bill and the provisions of it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No. In considering sections 3 and 4 that matter was considered. I can not see any objection to sections 3 and 4. These are the suggestions of the commission.

Mr. MANN. I am not raising any question. We have had a good deal of discussion on the subject of permitting freight to be carried on street-car lines.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If we adopt a policy with reference to that, we ought to follow the policy, and that is what I am seeking to ascertain.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I assume that as the commission submits these recommendations for 3 and 4 that it does follow it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman state to the committee whether this railroad company on the other trackage to which this extension does not apply has at present the privilege of carrying small freight, as provided in section 4 of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not think it has.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, this bill is something more than what the gentleman stated in his opening statement—that it is merely to provide an extension of a route based on a change of grade.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Sections 3 and 4 are added at the suggestion of the commission.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give the committee any information as to the extent of the lines that will be affected by extending this privilege of carrying freight throughout the District and also what other lines have that privilege at the present time?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, I can not; but I do want to say that I hope this privilege will be extended to suburban routes coming into the city. I think I am warranted in saying that in the States of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, and several other States, similar privileges are granted to suburban lines, and the people are the ones who are getting the advantage of this privilege. I know in my own State these privileges are granted to the railroads running out of Detroit into the State in different directions, and they are all permitted to carry milk and small parcels, as provided in this section here. I hope the gentlemen of the committee will have no objection to this legislation. I hope that it is to be encouraged here and elsewhere. It saves a good deal in express and in freight.

Mr. STAFFORD. To what lines would this privilege extend as incorporated in section 4? Because, as I understand it, it is an omnibus provision extending throughout the city to suburban railways operated by this company.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is simply one branch or one portion of seven or eight different ones that belong to the Washington Railway and Electric Company. That is the parent company, under which there are several other companies. This railroad starts down here by the Treasury Department, and goes out, of course, on different streets, and ends now in Brookland. As I say, its trackage ends now at the track of the Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and that is a very dangerous crossing.

The commissioners report that at least eight or nine people have already been killed there. I regret that we have not a larger map, so the committee could see; but, as a matter of fact, so far as this track is concerned, all the bill provides is to take up that little piece of track from that point down there, which I think exceeds not a quarter of a mile, and let the railroad put its tracks down on the street to which I point and which has been purchased by the citizens of Brookland.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe there is no opposition to the question of extension of trackage, but there is some serious question as to whether we should inaugurate a policy of permitting the street railways of this city to carry small freight.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, this is not a street railway of the city, it is a suburban railroad, and this privilege of shipping small freight would be a matter of great convenience to the people living along the line of that suburban road.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am trying to ascertain whether this line proceeds at all in the city of Washington or merely outside.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; it comes into the city of Washington and comes down to the Treasury Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. From what the gentleman from Mississippi said I got the idea it only referred to a suburban road outside.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I said it was a suburban electrical road, and the object is to allow this company to carry small parcels and let people coming in from the country bring in these things without having them shipped by freight or sent by express on the regular railroads. I agree with the gentleman it is a great benefit. I did not mean to say to the gentleman that the road did not run into the city at all by way of connection. There is no suburban road anywhere entering any city that does not run over some of its streets.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is hardly an electric line in the city that does not have some suburban cars operating on it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very few of them.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is the Fourteenth street line, with the cars from Chevy Chase coming in over it. I have been trying to ascertain how generally would this privilege be extended if it applied to all the suburban traffic of this company operating in the District.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This is only a provision for the City and Suburban, and I repeat that I hope this privilege will be granted to all the suburban roads for the reasons which I have stated, and I believe it is in the interest of the people to have that class of legislation as well as the railroads, too, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is certainly an additional easement in the use of the streets, if you grant the electric companies the right to carry freight, even if it is limited to between the hours of 12 o'clock midnight and 5 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is true.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman propose to give the street car companies the right to carry freight along on the streets?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the purpose of this provision.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What we propose to do by this bill is contained in section 4. It is for the conveyance of—parcels, milk, ice, light freight, and of fuel for the use of such company: Provided, That such cars shall be operated only between the hours of 12 o'clock midnight and 5 o'clock a. m.

I want to say to the gentleman, if I may, that in my own home city, when we were seeking to get a suburban road to carry small freight, we had a good deal of trouble in convincing the people that this was for their benefit, but I undertake to say you could not take that privilege away from the people of my home city now. What is true there is true of many other cities—in Flint and many other cities of Michigan, as well as in my city.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where does this freight come from?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This is along the line of the road.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Heavy freight?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; there is no intention in this of allowing them to bring in heavy freight; it expressly says "light freight."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I see what the gentleman has in mind entirely; but can not they bring in freight and park the cars on the street between the hours of 12 o'clock and 5 o'clock in the morning, so as to block up the street?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; it is all light freight.

Mr. STAFFORD. What would prevent the railroad company, under this section, from having a train of street cars loaded with light freight or package freight?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have never seen that kind of a privilege granted yet that it was not abused. How about the engine, or possibly the engine has been carried away——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is no engine about it; this is an electric railway.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. All right. I thought you were talking about the other. I like to be accommodating. I was going on the idea that it was the large commercial train.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No thought of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

EXTENSION OF RITTENHOUSE STREET.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 26472).

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 26472) to provide for the extension of Rittenhouse street, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That within ninety days after the passage of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sitting as a district court, under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension of Rittenhouse street on a straight extension of the lines thereof, as now established on the highway extension plan in the District of Columbia, from its present terminus at Broad Branch road eastwardly to the Daniels road, with a uniform width of 90 feet.

SEC. 2. That the assessments shall be made by the jury as benefits, as contemplated in section 491 of the subchapter of the Code hereinbefore referred to: Provided, That the total amount found to be due and awarded as damages, plus the cost and expenses of the proceedings, shall be assessed by the said jury as benefits.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $600 is hereby appropriated, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, to provide the necessary funds for costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto, to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments levied by the jury for benefits when the same are collected.

Also the following committee amendment:

Line 3, page 2, after the word "feet," strike out the period.

Strike out of line 14, page 1, the word "Daniels" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Daniel."

Strike out lines, 1, 2, and 3, and the words "referred to," in line 4, page 2, leaving the proviso in section 2 to stand as a proviso to section 1.

Strike out section 3, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following, to stand as section 3:

"SEC. 3. That there is hereby appropriated from the revenues of the District of Columbia an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto and for the payment of amounts awarded as damages; to be repaid to the District of Columbia from the assessments for benefits and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to take up a few minutes of the time of the committee in order to have read a clipping which I have here. It is not exactly pertinent to the discussion, but I was not able to be in the Chamber when the Washington gas question was discussed to-day. I want to have this clipping read. I cut it out of the San Francisco Examiner of February 1, and I hope everyone will listen to it. I especially ask this, because the doctor who speaks about this deadly gas lives in San Francisco, I presume, and is not supposed to be connected one way or another with the gas situation here in Washington. With that introduction and without further comment, I will ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

[San Francisco Examiner, February 1, 1909.]

ILLUMINATING GAS DEADLY POISON.

(By Dr. J. C. Bayles.)

No leakage of gas indoors is so slight that it may safely be neglected or tolerated as cheaper than repairs. Under all conditions and in all circumstances gas is something to be afraid of. This was true of the coal gas formerly used. It is much more true of the water gas now distributed. Coal gas, made by the distillation of bituminous coal in retorts, contained from 6 to 7 per cent of carbon monoxide, and a great deal of it was needed to render air unbreathable. Water gas contains from 30 to 35 per cent of carbon monoxide, and very little of it is immediately injurious and often quickly fatal. This product of imperfect combustion is the most deadly gas known to chemistry of those produced commercially. It is a blood poisoner of extraordinary energy. For the hemaglobin, upon which the blood depends for its ability to perform its functions in the human body, it has an affinity believed by physiologists to be about 400 times greater than that of oxygen. It is a cumulative poison, which in this case means that the blood will take up and hold all that it finds in air breathed, and continue absorbing it until, at about two-thirds of saturation, animal life becomes impossible.

There is no amount of carbon monoxide in inhaled air so small that the breather can afford to be indifferent to it. In many cases as little as the one-hundredth of 1 per cent will produce immediate ill effects, and continued exposure to even this small quantity involves danger to life. It is an odorless gas, as poisonous as arsenic, as dangerous as a blind rattlesnake, as incendiary as gun cotton. It can be detected by the sense of smell only when associated with the naphtha vapors which make it luminous.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Certainly, but I am done. I did not intend to make any comment. I simply wished to have that article read at the desk.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman introduced a bill yet to the effect that, whereas gas is poison and kerosene is dangerous, we all ought to go back to tallow candles?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; but I would rather go back to them than to realize, day in and day out, that I have something in my house that may take the life of my family or my own life. I have read by a tallow candle and would be glad to get them, as against this deadly gas.

Mr. MANN. Surely, we could all get along; better people than we are have used them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have had a great many pleasures with a tallow candle. Many a night have I studied my lessons by a tallow candle, and knew them next day—and sometimes I did not know them. But tenderest and sweetest memories cluster about the dim old tallow candle, I would not forget if I could.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is an experienced and expert man——

Mr. KEIFER rose.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. In the light of my friend from Ohio, I feel that I do not need a candle. And I know I can say the same thing of my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. It does seem to me remarkable that all at once everybody in the country has discovered that illuminating gas is poisonous. I was taught very early to be careful about letting illuminating gas loose in a room, but I discovered all at once that only one kind of gas is poisonous. Some people, doctors and others, are able to breathe illuminating gas if it is only made from coal. It is as innoxious as the gas emanating in this Chamber.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If it is no more noxious than the gas emanating from the gentleman from Illinois, it will not kill anybody. He lends a soft and luminous light to any occasion or subject. I feel a deep interest in this trouble we are having here in Washington in regard to this monoxide gas. I saw this opinion in the California paper. I clipped it and have carried it in my pocket for a day or two to hand to my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], or the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], but I let it escape my mind, and I have had no chance to do so to-day when the gas debate was on, so I have had it read from the desk. The gentleman from Illinois suggests that everybody seems to be too much scared about monoxide gas. We hardly knew that we had an appendix in our body until a few years ago, and now everybody has an appendix.

Mr. MANN. We do not know now.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As a matter of fact, we know we have one now, and it is very dangerous to irritate it. Appendicitis is a common trouble nowadays.

We used to call it "cramp colic," but we all know that appendicitis is very fatal if not promptly and successfully treated. But the cramp-colic remedy will not do for appendicitis. The knife must be used as a rule. We may have to use the knife in this gas trouble.

Gentlemen, you all know that I am going to leave you for good shortly, but I feel a very deep interest in this gas trouble and in the other reform, here started, as to the enormous rents Congress is paying in this city for private property for public use, the amount being $471,000 annually. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], as soon as he saw that I had begun this reform in the House, wrote me a letter, which I appreciated, sending me a copy of a partial investigation that he made some time ago on this subject, which report shows, I think, we are really doing an injustice to the public revenues by these rents, and we ought to know we will do injustice to ourselves if we continue this rental with this $471,000 rental staring us in the face. But I am not going to talk further about that. I will say this: That Senator SCOTT has introduced in the Senate a resolution similar to mine to investigate this rent matter, and I hope that it will pass.

This gas question is a very serious one. Whether it is monoxide gas or any other kind of gas trouble, it seems that whenever we undertake a gas reform in the District of Columbia we struggle day in and day out each Congress and do not accomplish anything. There are Members who have served with me here who know away back ten or twelve years ago we undertook to reduce the price of gas. I believe we succeeded not until this session, if I remember right, in doing so.

Mr. MANN. Not at all; the gentleman is mistaken. The bill is still pending in the other body.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Still pending in the other body! Shall it be the other body that must keep down this reform? I do not understand, gentlemen, how this great body—the greatest lawmaking body in the world—is not anxious enough for itself, is without industry enough, to find out what to do and do it. Have we not sufficient information on this subject to convince any thoughtful Member that this reform should be had and at once? Let the Senate pass that bill at once and at least reduce the price of good gas.

I am forced with the lights before my eyes to believe monoxide gas is deadly. We have heard of four or five deaths in the city of Washington caused by it; and there have been deaths in the city of Nashville in bathrooms warmed by gas stoves. I do not wish to speak to-day or to impose on the patience of the committee. I see that my friend from Michigan looks like he wanted a vote. How much work have you for this afternoon?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. We have two days' work that we want to do this afternoon.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, all right; I do not wish to speak. I have been drawn into this. Let me say this, gentlemen, there is something "rotten in the State of Denmark" as to this gas matter, and I think this great Congress ought to find it out at once and wipe it out. Either we have the very poorest lot of experts or this gas has been slandered. It behooves us not only to force this reform for this District, where we have full power to act for the people, but our example here will benefit the people throughout the States who use gas. We have some deadly gas, of course, elsewhere.

I do not know what sort of material produces it, but we know this gas is deadly and yet forced on the people here to use. We are told that it will take a great deal of money to make this change. A great deal of money to bar the people from dying by poison produced by gas! Think of weighing human life; think of weighing the happiness of our neighbors and our neighbors' friends; think of weighing the right to live and let live in the world by putting dollars and cents on the one side of the scales and human life upon the other! Money above life? They tell us that it will cost $7,000,000, or something like that, for this gas monopoly to make the change.

Is it not nobler and better for the American Congress, if it comes to a "show down," to buy this property that is owned here by some powerful concern and throw it in the Potomac River than to continue this menace to human life? I love human rights and human liberty, and yet you hear it in the selfish press here and in the streets that it will cost too much to reduce the price of gas or change from deadly gas. Think of it, gentlemen! Weighing dollars and cents in the scale with human rights and human liberty! I never intend to do that. I shall never put the dollar above the man. If this noxious gas kills here in one city where close watch is kept and reports made, how many deaths occur in other places of which no account is kept and where the people are ignorant of this gas being deadly?

As for my part, if I was on that committee—this is my personal view, and I am not reflecting in the least upon any man—I would vote to make this gas company stop manufacturing this gas altogether rather than have no reform at all, and I am ready to so vote. I hear the committee is to further investigate and want experts and more proof. Are we not beyond further expert evidence? They rarely ever agree, while we all know this gas is deadly. I do hope the committee will report a bill, so we can have time to make it law this session.

My faithful and patriotic friend [Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES] suggests to me that we vote millions of dollars to make machines with which to kill the enemy, but not a cent to stop suffocating our own flesh and blood.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman believe it would be a good thing if we could build a number of gas plants and furnish the army and navy with some of this deadly monoxide gas for use in warfare?

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. I would suggest that it would be all right if you could give the gas to the enemy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think of one of our troubles in the navy, as you gentlemen are talking about the navy. Let me say that the Yankee genius of this country invents and patents some great weapons of war, and then goes across the water and sells the patent to the enemy! We devise it, and the enemy gets it. Foreign nations in that way are put on a parity with us. Why are not these patentees patriots. And why do they not give or sell them to their own country and let the people on the other side of the world be without our improvements in the way of killing our people in war or peace? [Applause.]

Why, gentlemen, suppose we make four war ships every year and a foreign country makes four. Next year we make five and the foreign country makes five. What sense is there in that? Each keeps up with the other. Again, why do we let our smart naval men take the public time, public money, our public machine shops, our public materials—everything they want—and therewith discover some great death-dealing machine by which we could get ahead of foreign nations, but those men sell their patents to foreign nations. These officers use the Government's time, material, and aid to invent something, and possibly give the United States a mere license to use it; and then they take it over to the other side of the world and sell it to people who may some day be our enemies, and come here to fight us as well armed as we are, because of these patents. That would not be the case if we had a law passed to have these inventions patented in the name of the United States Government, so as to prevent selling it to the enemy. Why, foreign countries have smokeless powder now, made under our naval officers' patents, and would use it in a war with us.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman aware that so far from doing what the gentleman proposes, there is now upon the calendar a bill favorably reported which permits anyone in the government service to get a patent and then requires the Government to pay a price for the use of that patent?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. A person in the employ of the Government? Who introduced that bill?

Mr. MANN. Well, it is reported. It is not only introduced, but is reported from the committee, and would probably have passed before this if I had not objected to it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, that just shows that if a man will be serious, thoughtful, studious, and watchful, stands for the people, he will almost daily run up against an evil that should be curbed. The task is enough to turn even a young man gray-headed.

Mr. MANN. It has turned the good man gray-headed. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am satisfied that my friend has more gray matter on the inside than on the outside of his head, and I am glad it is so.

Let me tell you, this good old Scotchman down here whom I so much respect——

A MEMBER. William R. Smith, of the Botanic Garden?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; I like him, but I speak of Secretary Wilson, our Secretary of Agriculture. I wrote him a letter to-day that I hope he will appreciate. Whenever an employee in his department discovers anything valuable while using the time and money of the Government, under a rule of the department, although there is no statute law for it, I fear—it is provided—

[1905.—Department Circular No. 3.]

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., May 8, 1905.

To the Officers and Employees of the Department of Agriculture:

Hereafter when any employee of the department makes any new and useful discovery or invention of any machine, device, or process connected with the work of the department, through the expenditure of government time and government money, you are directed to cause a patent to be applied for on the said discovery or invention, through the law officer of the department. The patent will be taken out in the name of the inventor, without any expense to him, and will allow to any citizen of the United States the use of the patented article or process without payments of royalty.

All employees of this department are prohibited from patenting any device or process or discovery connected with the work of the department except in the manner above described.

JAMES WILSON,
Secretary of Agriculture.

To repeat: In some instances officers of the navy and army take out patents in their own name, making certain great improvements in army or navy machinery, and as a grace give a license to the Government of the United States to make the machinery by their patent, for example, guns or powder, and then they take their patents and sell them to foreign countries, so that when they come over here to fight us—fight another battle at New Orleans, and we have no Andrew Jackson now—they will be using guns like ours and smokeless powder like ours, made by these patents, taken out by these officials, who were educated at public expense at Annapolis and West Point, and possibly sent to foreign countries for further education, and made their discoveries in the line of duty, or with the machinery, time, and assistance of the Government. Thus we are educating the world how to fight us and then we spend millions to fix to fight them. Is not that the great way to keep ahead of the war powers of the world, or fix to whip them in battle or bring about peace? We educate ourselves and then go over there and teach them how to educate, and how to fight us. That is what we are doing and should be stopped.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that at this time, when there is so much said about trouble between this country and Japan, any citizen of the United States ought to be permitted, under our law, to sell any of these inventions to the Japanese?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not; and I think we ought to stop educating the Japanese, the Chinese, or the Germans, or the Englishmen, or any other foreigner at our military schools, and I have protested against it. We have been educating some of these, and as a result a trouble arose that was embarrassing. The first I heard of the trouble a leading Member came over to my desk and informed me in a general way about it, and said the bill contained an item to prevent a recurrence and he desired to have nothing said on the subject. I had always opposed allowing these foreigners into our schools. The item was passed without comment, as I recall it.

We educate and arm ourselves to fight, and then we permit those we have educated to go and teach the enemy how to use our guns, powder, and so forth, invented by our officers, which by rights, in many, if not all, cases the Government should have claimed and patented for our use only. We ought to have some reform in this matter, and I have so urged for years.

Now, I beg the indulgence of the chairman of the committee in taking up his time, but I want to talk a few minutes about Doctor Wiley. I want to say to you that I am a Wiley man. [Applause.] Doctor Wiley was fighting poison, rotten food, and a little of everything rotten we have bought here for years, and he stood alone [applause] like a giant; while these others that were all these years swinging around the corridors of great colleges, working for themselves, come along now, perched up on some sort of a board, fighting him. [Laughter.]

I am for Wiley, the father of pure food. [Applause.] I am for feeding the horse that draws the plow that makes the corn. [Applause.] We have a Chief Justice Fuller, and I am for Chief Justice Wiley. [Applause.] We have to have one head to utter the "last say" and end things. There has to be a head or authority beyond which no appeal can go; and no man is so fit as Wiley. He has come up from the bottom in this great fight. He has won thus far his spurs on many a hard-fought battlefield. He is a pure-food genius, and he is broad, bright, and brave. He is learned. He has stood for the people. He has stood for the clean thing. He is a clean man. He has fought day in and day out for a pure-food law and for its just and thorough enforcement. When he is now about to clean the Augean stable; when he is running the animals from their foul holes; when he has reached the creatures that have been feeding our sick children and wives upon poisoned food and deadly tin-can juices and billy-goat food, these kid-glove gentlemen come along here and want to close in on and crush him and the people, who have suffered long and patiently. When he wants to separate the sheep from the goats they cry: "Hold, enough of Doctor Wiley!" [Laughter and applause.]

Why swap horses crossing the creek? I am for Wiley, on land or sea; I am for a pure-food law first, last, and all the time, and I am for that great statesman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who did more to put it on the statute books than any other Member. [Applause.] I am glad that he is standing by Doctor Wiley, and I will stand for any man [laughter] that will stand for Doctor Wiley in this fight. [Applause.] And then he is a good Republican, and if there is anybody in the world who ought to be encouraged along, it is a good Republican. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I again beg my friend's pardon for taking up so much time. I will say further, gentlemen, that the people are now contented, made happier, there are fewer poisoned babies in the land because of this pure-food law and because it is being enforced by Doctor Wiley, who is at the head of it. [Applause.] I think he exposed more bad whisky than any other officer of the Government or the land. I think he is an expert on this job. He said, I am told, that the Tennessee whisky is the purest and best whisky made in this country, and I want to say to you that the people have about fixed to wipe that out of Tennessee, and I am glad of that.

Mr. SIMS. Does not the gentleman think that it would be better to wipe it out of all the States?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; by voting it out or otherwise, and I hope sooner or later that dear old Kentucky will be stripped of the distinguished honor of furnishing the next best whisky in the world. [Laughter.] I love her people, her history, and her memories. My father was born within her limits, I know her people, and I stand by her with the same heart that makes me love my own State.

Mr. Chairman, I could say a lot of things if I were to turn loose on this whisky subject, but I will not now. It is not the time to-day. It is late, and we must move on. But I will say I like to see a man, when he fights, hit above the belt. The whisky people, when they have fought, do not hit above the belt, but they use every despicable means known to the ingenuity of man and money to carry their point, corrupting the morals and the peace and happiness of the people of the country. I am against that practice in that kind of a contest or any other.

A MEMBER. Tell us about Wall street.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, these are a few suppressed thoughts that I have kept to myself, because of peculiar and distressing conditions elsewhere. This subject, Mr. Chairman, I did not dream of discussing; but before I conclude—— [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

A MEMBER. Give us something about General Jackson.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I believe if Andrew Jackson [applause] were living to-day, that Andrew Jackson, the great, would stand by the side of Doctor Wiley and pure food [continued applause], as he is the only man when President of the United States who ever crushed a federal monopoly; and as I hold in my hand the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, just handed down last Monday by Mr. Justice Harlan, affirming the opinion written by Judge Lurton, of my own State, on the subject of monopoly, it may not be inappropriate for me to ask unanimous consent, which I do, to place this opinion in the RECORD, so that we may all know——

Mr. MANN. Oh, tell us about it. We will not read it in the RECORD.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to pass his bill? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman's bill is perfectly safe.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, all right. I will tell you what the court decided, and the court decided right, and I congratulated that splendid old Kentuckian, Judge Harlan, on the opinion that he wrote; but this debtor ought to pay his creditor. He held that the court, though asked, would not be a party to enforcing the contracts of a person or corporation engaged in violation of the Sherman antitrust law; that the court would not be a party to upholding the violator of unlawful contract. And I want to say that is the common law of the States. Let us take the great case of Richardson v. Alger et al., reported in 1890 in one of the Michigan reports—the Diamond Match Trust case.

Senator Sherman, in fighting as he did for our antitrust law, read the same law from the opinion in that case, and you will find it in the debates on that subject. It was the law when Congress was discussing the Sherman antitrust law and long before that, and, thank God, it is the law now, that the great courts of this country—the greatest court that sits under God's sunshine—says that it will not be a party to a violation of the law of the land; and I am delighted to know that while the Department of Justice is slow to enforce that law, that when once a case under that antitrust statute gets to the Supreme Court of the United States that court is mighty and powerful, clean-cut and clear in pronouncing judgment against violators of that great statute. [Applause.] It was suggested in a number of bills introduced at the time in the Fiftieth or Fifty-first Congresses that Congress write into the face of the statute that no contracts shall be enforced made in violation of this law, and the defendants could so plead and bar recovery.

Senator George, Mr. Breckinridge, and Senator RAYNER introduced such bills. So did Mr. Anderson, Republican from Iowa, and others, but perhaps when they read this opinion from the great Michigan court and saw it was already and had been all the while the common law, Congress did not write it into the statute. Judge Harlan and four of his associates affirmed the opinion of Judge Lurton, sitting at circuit, holding that court will not be a party to upholding contracts which violate the Sherman antitrust law. If a litigant asks equity, he must do equity. If he comes into court and says that my hands are dirty, he must show that his own hands are clean before the court will grant relief. It is good law, it ought to be the law, and I hope in the future it will greatly aid in enforcing that law that almost slumbers on the statute books, that ought to be vigorously enforced and that the federal judges are not enforcing.

The report of the Department of Justice for 1908, which I hold in my hand, shows that in the great city of New York—where about all the devilment in monopoly starts; there where it is capitalized with water and wind, muck and mire, disaster and bankruptcy [laughter and applause]; where all the king bees reside; where "Chief Justice" J. Pierpont Morgan lives and umpires all these swollen fortunes and our dropsical prosperity—not a single case is pending in the federal court in the southern district of New York or New York City under the Sherman antitrust law. Where is the district attorney of that district? Is he asleep? Is he chloroformed? Who controls him, or does he not know what the law is? Where are the district judges? Have they charged the grand jury to investigate these monopolies? If so, when and in what case? The district attorney is not, in criminal cases under this law, subject to the control of the Attorney-General of the United States. The Sherman antitrust law gives the Attorney-General no such power. The execution of the criminal sections of this law is left to the grand jury, the court, and the district attorney. Each and all can move against trusts under these criminal sections whether the Department of Justice desires it or not.

Mr. Chairman, it is a remarkable thing, under the circumstances, and when the law is so plain and broad, that not a single indictment was pending in this district up to the end of the last fiscal year, and yet that district comprises the city of New York. This report of the Department of Justice shows that. Yet Members from New York City are crying for more federal judges. More of that kind? Excuse me, if you please.

These officers sworn to uphold and enforce the law, and yet not a single indictment in a single federal court in the city of New York.

Mr. COX of Indiana. And they want their salaries increased.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Here is the great Tennessee Coal and Iron combination, a concern that was born and operates in the State of Tennessee and has reached out into Alabama, and it and the United States Steel Company combined, November, 1907——

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Within the last eighteen months there have been two sets of corporations indicted in the southern district of New York for violation of the Sherman antitrust law. One pleaded guilty and the disposition of the other indictment I am not aware of at this time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did the corporations plead guilty or the men?

Mr. BENNET of New York. In one case something like——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did they plead guilty?

Mr. BENNET of New York. They plead guilty.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The corporations?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And not the God-made man—wait a minute——

Mr. BENNET of New York. Is there any other kind of a man?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; there is the corporation that is the man-made man. Did that plead guilty?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The corporation plead guilty.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Ah, why did not they fine the rascals who did the dirty work in the name of the corporation? [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman refer to the box-board combination?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It was a paper combination; yes.

Mr. MANN. And the information in regard to which was elicited by the special committee, but there were both corporations and individuals fined, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I am glad of the gentleman's assistance.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. The gentleman from Tennessee ought to inquire why they did not send them to the penitentiary for violation of this law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why did not they send the corporation to the penitentiary or jail?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I refer you to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why did not they convict the defendants?

Mr. BENNET of New York. They did convict them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You have just stated they convicted the corporation.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The corporation and individuals.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much was the fine?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why did not they put them in jail?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I suppose they thought that was punishment enough.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is $50,000 to that gang of people who skin the people throughout the United States? [Applause.] What is $50,000 to a Wall street gang? I do not speak of the good men, if there are any there. I am talking about those Wall street creatures who disgrace the good ones in Wall street and the city of New York.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that if he will not object to our getting the additional judge, so as to bring up our calendar, which is three years behind, we will bring more prosecutions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will let the judge matter in if you will promise me the judge will charge the grand jury to look into the Tennessee Coal merger, even if it, the Tennessee company, was started in that State; that is fair. If you promise that we will have that done. Now, answer my question. [Applause.] Will the gentleman make that promise?

Mr. BENNET of New York. If the gentleman will let me say——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. All right; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BENNET of New York (continuing). I will convey the information to that judge when appointed, and will also take great pleasure in telling him from what a distinguished source the request comes. That is as far as——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is, from yourself.

Mr. BENNET of New York. No; from the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thought you were going to ask me. Now, I will tell you what I did. I asked District Judge Clark, at Nashville, to charge the federal grand jury to investigate the tobacco trust, and he immediately did so. And then I offered to go before that grand jury and state all about that infamous monopoly that has caused so much trouble in this country, and the district attorney shut the grand jury door and would not let me in or any other witness. Now, wait a minute. Will the gentleman go to this judge and request him, as I did, to charge this federal grand jury to investigate this steel merger?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Of course the gentleman is perfectly aware——

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] will not commit himself on a proposition of that sort. [Laughter.] I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not withdraw his objection.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I think the gentleman from Illinois can sufficiently trust the "gentleman from New York" to that extent.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman is an interesting conversationalist. Does he say "yes" or "no" to my proposition?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will not say either one.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman believe that the merger should be investigated by the grand jury?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I have not any information about it at all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And live in New York?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The Senate is investigating.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The Senate is not a criminal court. [Laughter.] Does not the gentleman believe that this is a thing that is menacing or will menace the welfare of the United States and the people thereof, and that the United States district attorney should lay such a matter before the grand jury, and that the judge should charge the grand jury to investigate it?

Mr. BENNET of New York. If the gentleman will let me answer it honestly and not try to hold me down to yes and no, I will try to answer it. I certainly believe any new judge or any old judge, any judge in New York or any judge in Tennessee, ought to charge a grand jury in his district, where there is a public suspicion that a violation of an important statute has been committed, and a particularly gross violation of a statute, if you can differentiate, ought to charge his grand jury about that.

Now, so far as I am personally concerned, I am not conversant with any of these facts in regard to this merger. I have such a confidence in our federal judiciary of the southern district of New York, who have done so much since I have known about them, that I feel certain if there is any such general suspicion they will in the future, as they have in the past, charge their grand jury appropriately.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, wait a minute. The rule is, if the court or the Attorney-General thinks "there is probable cause to believe a violation of the law" has been committed, the judge should charge the grand jury. Now, that merger occurred in November, 1907. It shocked the whole country. The Tennessee Coal and Iron Company was the only competitor of the Steel trust, and now they are one thing. They hold up the United States in their building, and the States in their building, and every man that uses steel. They have a monopoly of the United States. Does not the gentleman think that on such a statement he could go to the judge, if I let him in, with his bill, and have him convey that data to the court and ask the judge to charge his grand jury?

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. The gentleman from New York started out by saying that if the gentleman from Tennessee would agree to give an additional judge there, he would have these prosecutions pushed.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Oh, no.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Now, he comes with a statement that he will have this judge do as the other judges have done.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I said if you would give us more judges we would make the prosecutions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the violation of the Sherman antitrust law can not be charged by the district judge in the city of New York, I shall be very slow to withdraw my objection, because I do not like that way of administering that great law.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will ask my friend if he does not think the fact that our grand juries have indicted, and that, either upon pleas or conviction on trial, there have been convictions in our southern district of New York in the last eighteen months, is pretty good evidence that we are intending to enforce our laws?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman would not make an incorrect statement here if he knew it. Here is the last report of the Attorney-General of the United States, in 1908, and here is a list of the cases in each one of the federal circuits in the United States. Here is a record of the "southern district of the State of New York" (New York City), and here is the column where the Attorney-General of the United States notes the "Sherman antitrust suits" in that district, and there is not a single suit named in that column. I will hand the gentleman the book—the last report of the Attorney-General, Mr. Bonaparte.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I do not care anything about the book.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If you can find a single suit filed in that column under the Sherman antitrust law, I am willing to let your new judge bill come up anyhow.

Mr. BENNET of New York. What is the last date? They only run up to July, 1908.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Nineteen hundred and eight, yes. There are none in this 1908 book, for 1909.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has a personal recollection of what has been done since then.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have here in my hand Attorney-General Bonaparte's last report of the Department of Justice, and in that report he states there were about 15 suits pending under the Sherman antitrust law throughout the country when this report was filed, and not one in New York City, where Morgan lives and runs his monopoly hatchery. [Laughter.] He is the man who got up the Northern Security railroad combination known as the "Merger case," and Judge Harlan, for the Supreme Court, in his opinion stated, that Mr. Morgan knew, if any man did know, that that merger was in violation of the Sherman antitrust law, and though he lived in New York, where this merger was formed, he was not indicted, nor was the grand jury charged to investigate that merger, and, in November, 1907, Mr. Morgan backed up and helped to combine the Tennessee Coal, Iron, and Railroad Company with the United States Steel Company.

What is the matter with the district judge that he sees in neither of these cases "probable cause to believe" that these mergers were acts in violation of this statute? I wish to heaven that I had a chance to charge a grand jury; I think I would make, in the long run, Mr. Morgan take off his silk stockings and put on black-striped cotton ones in the New York penitentiary. [Laughter.] I am not bloody; I am not cruel, though you have to be cruel sometimes to be kind, but I stand by that great statute and the preservation of the people's rights, while Mr. Morgan is as heartless as a stone and cares just as little for this statute as the devil does for a hot fire.

Now, with this condition of things existing for years back and now, with this stealthy defiance of this great statute, with a half million dollars extra behind the law to enforce it, with grand juries and secret-service men, with a wilderness of marshals and district attorneys and assistants and assistants and assistants, with the people's rights endangered, with public and private morals challenged, with Democrats and good Republicans begging the officers of the law to enforce this statute, we find in the southern district of New York, where Mr. Morgan's monopoly incubator and the Wall street menagerie are, there is not a single indictment recorded in the Attorney-General's last report, which I hold in my hand. Ah, gentlemen—

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and "judges" decay.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. You have been describing many of the so-called "crying evils" of the times from which the public ought to be relieved. Do you mind telling the House what would happen to J. Pierpont Morgan's silk hose if he should send them to one of the steam laundries in the District of Columbia? [Great laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, I am not proposing to send stockings to the laundry; but they would never get them clean if he did, if his stockings correspond with some of his "deals."

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask to insert in the RECORD the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Continental Wall Paper Company's case, which has just been printed.

Mr. KEIFER. It is found in the record, and I think it ought not to go in.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It has already been delivered and is very important.

Mr. KEIFER. Is it a long opinion?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, yes; and very important.

Mr. KEIFER. There are several opinions.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. One opinion is by Judge Harlan and four associates and a dissenting opinion by Judge Holmes and three other of the associates.

Mr. KEIFER. Do you want to put them all in?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; but I am willing that we shall only print Judge Harlan's opinion, if the gentleman does not wish the others to go in.

Mr. KEIFER. I think you had better put in Judge Harlan's only.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. What does the Chair understand is to be printed?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Judge Harlan's opinion if the gentleman objects to the other.

The opinion of Judge Harlan is as follows:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

[No. 15.—October term, 1908.]

Continental Wall Paper Company, plaintiff, v. The Louis Voight & Sons Company. On writ of certiorari to the United States circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit.—February 1, 1909.

The Continental Wall Paper Company, a corporation of New York, brought this action against the Louis Voight & Sons Company, a corporation of Ohio, to recover the sum of $56,762.10 as the alleged balance on an account for merchandise sold and delivered to the defendant.

The petition and answer were both amended. The amended answer contained six separate defenses, the last three of which were made counterclaims and cross petitions. The plaintiff demurred to the second, third, fourth, and fifth defenses upon the ground that neither of them stated facts sufficient to constitute a defense, and it demurred to the first and second counterclaims and cross petitions upon the ground that they did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the plaintiff. It also replied to the sixth defense and to the third counterclaim.

The cause was submitted in the circuit court on the demurrers; and the court sustained the demurrer to the second, fourth, and fifth defenses and to the first and second counterclaims and cross petitions, but overruled the demurrer to the third defense. The parties not desiring to plead further, it was adjudged that upon the allegations of the third defense the defendant was entitled to judgment (and judgment was entered) dismissing the petition and amended petition, and was likewise entitled to judgment (and judgment was entered) dismissing the first and second counterclaims and cross petitions. The case was carried by the Continental Wall Paper Company to the circuit court of appeals, where it was assigned for error that the circuit court erred in overruling the demurrer to the third defense and in dismissing the suit. The circuit court of appeals affirmed the judgment, thereby sustaining the sufficiency of that defense. The case is fully reported in 148 Federal Reporter, 939.

If the facts stated in the third defense—taking them to be true, as upon demurrer we must do—are sufficient to prevent any recovery whatever by the plaintiff, it is not necessary to go further and consider any other questions. In view of the peculiar character of the case it is deemed just to the parties, however much it may lengthen or burden this opinion to do so, to set out that defense fully and in the words of the answer.

The third defense—the facts stated therein being admitted by the demurrer—gives the names of numerous companies and firms (more than 30 in number) which formed a combination by the name of the Continental Wall Paper Company, and also sets out the various agreements under which, it was alleged, the combination was organized to restrain and monopolize interstate commerce. The defendant corporation alleged that on the 1st day of July, 1898, the National Wall Paper Company was the owner of factories for the manufacture of wall paper in certain cities in New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Massachusetts, and that there were like factories owned by persons and corporations in other States; that "all of said companies and firms were engaged in the manufacture of wall paper and in selling their product in the States where their said manufactories were situated, and in all the other States and Territories of the United States and in foreign countries, and were each and all engaged in commerce between the States and Territories and with foreign nations, and they produced and sold upward of 98 per cent of all the wall paper manufactured and sold in the several States and Territories of the United States. Contriving and intending and conspiring with each other to form a combination and trust by which to limit the production of wall paper in the United States and also to enhance the price thereof to the jobbers, the wholesalers, the retailers, and the consumers of wall paper, which is an article of commodity of general necessity and use among the United States and foreign countries and, as such, was and is used and sold everywhere for the preservation, protection, and decoration of buildings and dwelling houses; and, contriving and intending and conspiring with each other to unlawfully control and restrain trade and commerce between the several States and Territories of the United States and with foreign countries, the firms and corporations hereinbefore mentioned agreed with each other that, while said corporations and persons retain the ownership of their several plants and business and preserve and continue their separate identities and operate said several manufactories and business as before, the control of said several businesses, and all matters relating to and affecting the production of said establishments and the prices and sale of wall paper manufactured thereby, should be placed under the control of a committee to be appointed by said several corporations and firms, each to have a voice in such appointment in proportion to the capacity of the several factories owned by them, respectively; that said committee should adopt rules and regulations governing the manner of conducting the business of all said persons, firms, and corporations, the hours said factories owned by them should be operated, the patterns of wall paper to be manufactured by them, the times when samples of the goods to be manufactured for the ensuing season should be submitted to a pricing committee, appointed by said committee, to enable it to classify and fix the list prices thereof; to fix and determine list prices, discounts, terms of sale, equalization of freight rates, and all other matters affecting the production and regulation of prices, and the classification of the dealers in wall paper in the United States; and the prices at which wall paper should be sold to and by such several classes; and the division of the profits thence arising among said corporations and firms, not in proportion to their production and sales, but in proportion to their capacity; and, further, that to secure the faithful performance by each of said persons and corporations of the provisions of said trust agreement, they should each pay a sum into a common pool, in proportion to the capacity of their respective manufactories, which said sum should be forfeited by any of said manufacturers who should break said agreement, compete with the other parties to said agreement, or sell at other or different prices than those to be fixed by said committee. * * *"

* * * * * * * *

"The National Wall Paper Company, for itself and the members of said combination, hereinbefore alleged to be represented by it, should select three so-called 'directors' of said The Continental Wall Paper Company, and said other firms and corporations should select three other so-called 'directors' of said company, which six so-called 'directors' should select a seventh, who should decide all disputed matters; that said corporation and firms, calling itself or themselves, respectively, the vendor, should sign a printed contract or agreement with said The Continental Wall Paper Company, calling itself the company, a copy of which contract or agreement is attached hereto marked 'Exhibit 1'

[which is given in the margin *] the said agreement being printed with blanks for the necessary signatures as well as numbers of shares allotted, the sum to be paid therefor and the name of the so-called 'vendor.'

"For the purposes and with the intentions aforesaid, it was further agreed that said The Continental Wall Paper Company should, in some form so as to disguise the real nature of the transaction, compel all dealers in wall paper, whether jobbers or wholesalers, to sign an agreement obligating the jobbers or wholesalers to buy from no one but said members of said combination and trust, and at the prices fixed in Schedule B, attached to said 'Exhibit 1,' and likewise an agreement by such jobbers not to sell goods to dealers other than jobbers at lower prices or upon better or more favorable terms than those shown in Schedule C, attached to said 'Exhibit 1,' under the penalty that, if they refused so to do, no wall paper should be sold to such jobber by any of said corporations or firms, and that thereby such jobbers should be driven out of business; and that in some form or other, so as to disguise the real nature of the transaction, all wholesalers other than jobbers should be compelled to make an agreement in writing with said corporations or firms not to sell such goods on terms better or more favorable than those specified in Schedule C, attached to said 'Exhibit 1,' under penalty that if such wholesaler refuse to sign and carry out said agreement no wall paper would be sold to him by any of said corporations or firms, and he should be driven out of business, and that the profits made by such prevention of competition and enhancement of price should be divided among said corporations and firms nominally as dividends upon said stock, but in reality in proportion to their respective holdings as aforesaid, and that said committee of said corporation and said firms, calling themselves such directors, should regulate all the matters hereinbefore averred, prevent competition between said corporations and firms, limit production and enhance prices, and close all channels by which the consumer or retailer could obtain wall paper from the producers thereof.

"In pursuance of said agreement, said plaintiff was nominally incorporated with the stock aforesaid, divided into the number of shares aforesaid, of the par value aforesaid, which were divided among the parties to said agreement aforesaid, in the manner aforesaid, and said contracts signed by said The National Wall Paper Company and said persons and corporations, being, at once, subscription for stock by said so-called vendors, the acceptance of such subscription by said The Continental Wall Paper Company, and by it, nominally, each so-called vendor sold unto the company, and the latter agreed to purchase, the entire product of wall paper manufactured by each of said vendors for the period from July 20, A. D. 1898, to the 1st day of July, A. D. 1899.

"Said contract further fixed prices at which the merchandise should be nominally sold to the company, said prices being the cost of production with a slight profit added thereto, sufficient to cover incidental expenses merely. The prices at which said goods were to be nominally sold by said so-called vendors to said company are set forth in the schedule attached to said 'Exhibit 1' and marked 'A.'

"Said agreement further nominally provided that the goods pretended to be acquired by the company from the so-called vendor, which were to be sold by jobbers, should be so sold by the company and not by the vendor, for the account of the company, but that the goods acquired by the company from the so-called vendor, which should be sold to

An agreement made this — day of ———, in the year 1898, by and between ——— ———, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of ——— (hereinafter called the vendor), party of the first part, and the Continental Wall Paper Company, organized under the laws of the State of New York (hereinafter called the company), party of the second part.

Whereas the vendor is engaged in the manufacture and sale of wall paper, borders, and other articles usually produced and handled in connection therewith, and the company is desirous of action as its selling agent in handling the entire product of the vendor; and

Whereas the company has an authorized capital of $200,000, divided into 16,000 shares, of the par value of $12.50 each; and

Whereas the vendor is desirous of acquiring shares of the stock of said company at par, and to that end has offered to enter into this agreement and to secure the performance thereof by the deposit of said shares.

Now, therefore, in consideration of the foregoing recitals, and for other good and valuable considerations, it is agreed between the parties hereto as follows:

First. The vendor hereby agrees to sell unto the company and the latter agrees to purchase the entire product of wall paper that may be manufactured by the vendor for the period from July 20, 1898, to the 1st day of July, 1899.

The prices at which the merchandise shall be sold to the company are set forth in a schedule hereto annexed, marked "A," and hereby made part of this agreement.

The vendor further grants unto the company the right to two renewals of said contract of one year each, provided that in the event of the election of the company to avail itself of either of said renewals it shall so signify in writing to the vendor before the 1st day of June next preceding the renewal term, and provided further that such election to renew shall be accompanied by the written consents of all the registered stockholders of the company, including that of the vendor.

Second. That the goods acquired by the company from the vender hereunder which are to be sold to jobbers, shall be so sold by the company, and not by the vender, for the account of the company. Such sale shall be made by the company at discounts from road prices fixed in the schedule hereto annexed, marked "B," which is hereby made part of this agreement. The vender will deliver such goods upon the direction of the company, at the risk and for the account of the latter, f. o. b. at the place of manufacture, provided, however, that in all cases in which the goods are manufactured at places other than the cities of New York or Philadelphia the vender will equalize the freights with either of said cities out of the proceeds receivable for such goods. Memorandum invoices shall be supplied to the customers and to the company immediately upon the shipment and delivery of such goods, said invoices specifying quantities and road prices.

Third. There shall be furnished by the vender to the company, on the 7th, 14th, 21st, and last days of each month (except when those days fall on Sundays, and then on the next preceding day), a just and true statement of all shipments and deliveries of merchandise included in this contract which the vender may make for the account of the company, which statement shall contain the names of the purchasers, the character of the goods sold, and the prices at which they are sold, to the end that the company may make the proper charges and in order to entitle the vender to be credited with the agreed cost price for such goods.

Each of such statements of shipment shall be accompanied by an affidavit of one of the officers of the vender and one of its bookkeepers and of one of its shipping clerks, to the effect that the information contained therein is true.

Fourth. The vender will, at the option of the company, sell for the latter such of the goods manufactured by the vender as are to be disposed of to purchasers not classified as jobbers, which sales shall be made at the cost and expense of the vender, said vender hereby guaranteeing all credits connected with such sales. The prices at which and the terms upon which such goods are to be sold are designated in this agreement as the "road prices," and are contained in a schedule hereto annexed, marked "C," which is hereby made a part of this agreement.

On the 7th, 14th, 21st, and last days of each month (except when those days fall on Sundays, and then on the next succeeding days) the vender will furnish to the company a statement showing all the shipments made on account of such sales, which statement shall contain the names of the purchasers, the character of the goods, and the prices at which they were sold, and such sales shall be credited to the vendor by the company at the prices fixed in Schedule A, and shall be charged against said vendor at the prices at which they were sold, which shall in no event be less than those designated in Schedule C.

The vendor is to receive for its services and expenses connected with such sales and allowances discounts equal to those who are designated in a classification made by the parties hereto as "second-class jobbers," less the discounts made on sales to purchasers designated in the accompanying schedules as "quantity purchasers," on which the vendor has allowed the quantity discount, except that where special and exclusive goods are sold there shall be an allowance of 30 per cent discount to the vendor.

The prices of goods as fixed by Schedules A and C may be altered from time to time, but the discounts allowed to jobbers shall not be altered at any time during the term of this agreement.

Fifth. The vendor will make collections of all accounts for goods sold by it for the accounts of the company under the provisions of the agreement, except for sales to jobbers (which accounts the company is to collect), and will, on the 10th of each and every month during the term of this agreement, account to the company. Such accounts shall be accompanied by a payment by the vendor to the company of the difference between the prices at which the goods are agreed to be sold to the company, as embodied in Schedule A, and the prices at which the vendor has agreed to dispose of said goods, as contained in Schedule C.

The purchases made by the company from the vendor hereunder shall be upon the same credit and terms as those accorded to other dealers, but the company shall have the right to anticipate the due date of all such purchases, and will pay, on the 10th day of each month, to the vendor a sum on account of all shipments of the preceding month equal to not less than 30 per cent of the road prices of goods shipped to the jobbers by the company.

Sixth. The vendor hereby grants unto the company the right, and it shall be the duty of the latter, through its officers selected for that purpose, to audit the books of accounts of the vendor at such times and in such manner as the company may, from time to time, deem necessary or proper. This provision is of the essence of the agreement, and a failure on the part of the vendor to faithfully perform the same shall operate as a breach of the contract entitling the company to abrogate the agreement and to such damages as it may be able to establish in addition to the absolute transfer and surrender to it of the stock to be pledged as hereinafter provided.

Seventh. There shall be a committee selected from the company to be known as an auditing committee, which shall be made up from among the directors. Said committee shall have power to establish such a system of bookkeeping as in its judgment may be advisable.

In order to conform as nearly as may be to the laws of the various States in which the factories of the vendor are located, it is understood that the vendor shall not be at liberty to require from the company the acceptance of the product of more than ten hours per day of any one of said factories.

The product intended to be sold to the company hereunder, and which the latter undertakes to acquire, does not contemplate the enlargement of the manufacturing facilities of the vendor, but nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting the right of the vendor to substitute new machinery of the same capacity for any now in use which may become useless through wear or through destruction by fire or other casualty.

The power to designate the parties who are to be classed as jobbers and the discounts to which they are entitled is expressly reserved by the company, and such designation is to be made through its board of directors, but the vendor shall have the right to select the jobbers through whom the goods manufactured by it are to be distributed.

All orders placed with the vendor by jobbers on behalf of the company must at once be reported to the latter.

Eighth. The company hereby agrees to sell and the vendor agrees to purchase ——— shares of the common stock of the company, for which stock the vendor agrees to pay the sum of ——— in cash as soon after the execution and delivery of this agreement as the same may be demanded by the company, but only if and when the entire share capital of the company shall have been fully subscribed at not less than par.

The vendor will, after paying for said shares of stock, indorse the certificates representing the same and deliver the certificates so indorsed in blank unto the company, upon the trust and agreement that the company shall hold said certificates as security for the performance by the vendor of each and all of the covenants and conditions of this agreement, and that upon the refusal, neglect, or omission of the vendor, its successors or assigns, to perform this agreement, or any part thereof, the said shares of stock and certificates represented thereby shall be immediately sold by the company at public or private sale without notice upon such terms and at such price as the company or its officers may deem reasonable, and that the proceeds of the sale be paid into the treasury of the company as agreed and liquidated damages to the company for the breach of said agreement.

The parties hereto have fixed upon the said stock and the proceeds thereof as liquidated damages because of the difficulty in establishing in a court of law the actual damage that would be suffered by the company in the event of the refusal, neglect, or omission to perform this agreement and in order to avoid the difficulty of such proof.

In witness whereof the vendor and the company have respectively caused this agreement to be executed by their respective presidents and their respective corporate seals to be hereto attached pursuant to resolutions of their respective boards of directors the day and year first above written.

wholesalers other than jobbers, should be sold by the so-called vendor for the account of the company.

"The schedule attached to said agreement contained a list of prices for all commodities in the wall-paper line, which were called 'List' or 'Road prices,' and said contract provided that sales made to jobbers should be made at discounts from said 'List' or 'Road prices' fixed in the schedule marked 'B,' annexed to said 'Exhibit 1,' but that, in all cases in which the goods were manufactured at places other than the cities of New York or Philadelphia, and sold to jobbers, the vendor should equalize the freights with either of the said cities out of the proceeds receivable for such goods.

"In reality, the agreement was, and so the business was carried on, that the manufacturers should maintain sample rooms and selling agents, and should solicit and receive the orders from all wholesalers, whether jobbers or so-called 'Road' or 'Quantity buyers;' that the entire business should be done by said so-called vendors, but payments should be made by the jobbers to the so-called company, and by the wholesalers, other than jobbers, directly to the so-called vendors.

"Said contract further provided, in order to protect said corporations and firms against competition from each other, and to insure against violation of said agreement, or any of them, that, from time to time, invoices should be supplied at once to the customer and to the company upon shipment and delivery of such goods, specifying quantities and road prices; that each vendor should furnish to the company, at periods stated, just, true, and sworn statements of all shipments and deliveries of merchandise made by the vendors direct to the purchasers, which statements should contain the names of the purchasers, the character of the goods sold, and the prices at which they were sold, so that the company might receive the difference between the prices at which the goods were nominally billed to said company and at which they were sold to the purchaser, to the end that this difference, being the net profits derived from such purchase and sale, should be divided among such corporations and firms in proportion to the capacity of their respective businesses, determined as aforesaid, without regards to the amount sold by each.

"The prices at which, and the terms upon which, goods were to be sold by the vendors to all wholesalers other than jobbers were designated 'Road' or 'List' prices, and were contained in the schedule marked 'C,' annexed to said 'Exhibit 1,' and forming a part thereof.

"For the further purpose of carrying out said agreement, and ascertaining said net profits, and for further disguising the real nature of the transaction, it was provided that the so-called 'vender' should receive from sales made by it to so-called 'quantity buyers' the difference between the discounts allowed to those designated in the classification hereinbefore referred to as 'second-class jobbers' and the discounts provided in said agreement to be made to purchasers styled, in said schedules, 'quantity buyers,' in which the vender is allowed the quantity discount, except that, where special and exclusive goods were sold, there should be an allowance of 30 per cent discount to said vender.

"Said agreement further stipulated that the prices of goods as fixed by said Schedules A and C might be altered from time to time, but the discounts allowed to jobbers should not be altered at any time during the term of the agreement.

"Said written contract further provided that the so-called 'vender' should make collections of accounts for goods sold to wholesalers other than the jobbers, but that the company should collect the proceeds of sales to the jobbers, and that accounts should be stated between the so-called 'venders' and the company at stated periods, and the account accompanied by payment, by the so-called 'vender,' to the so-called 'company,' of the difference between the prices at which the goods were to be billed to the company and the prices at which the so-called 'venders' had agreed to charge the 'quantity buyers.'

"It was further stipulated in said agreement that monthly divisions should be made by said company of at least 30 per cent of the 'road prices' of goods shipped to jobbers by the company.

"For the further purpose of protecting said corporations and firms and individuals from each other, preventing and stifling competition, and enforcing said combination, trust, and monopoly, each of said corporations and venders gave the company the right, and made it the duty of the company, to audit the books of account of said so-called 'venders' at such times and in such manner as the company might from time to time deem necessary or proper. It was further stipulated that this right to examine and audit the books was of the essence of the agreement, and that a failure on the part of the so-called 'vender' to permit the same should operate as a breach of the contract, entitling the company to abrogate the agreement, to recover such damages as it might be able to establish, and to the forfeiture of the stock held by said vender in such company.

"It was further provided that said so-called 'company' should appoint an auditing committee from its directors, which should establish such a system of bookkeeping as it thought advisable.

* * * * * * *

"It was further a part of said agreements, though not reduced to writing, save as it set forth in said exhibit, that all jobbers and other wholesalers of wall paper should be forced to sign an agrement binding themselves to purchase their entire stock of wall paper nominally either from plaintiff or from said corporations or firms, at prices fixed in said 'Exhibit 1,' and that they should only sell at prices fixed in the schedules attached to said 'Exhibit 1,' under the penalty, which the combination of all of said corporations and firms enabled them to enforce, that such jobbers or wholesalers, in case of refusal to accede to the terms so imposed, or in case of violation thereof, should be unable to buy wall paper, should be driven out of business, and should sacrifice the good will and capital therein invested.

* * * * * * *

"In the further carrying out of said purpose said plaintiff and other persons, natural or artificial, engaged in the manufacture and sale of wall paper in different States of the Union, and in trade and commerce between the several States and foreign countries, whose names and locations these defendants are unable to state, entered into contracts substantially similar to 'Exhibit 1,' except that, instead of such persons pledging stock in plaintiff as security for the performance by them of the stipulations of said contract, they gave other security, the nature of which these defendants are unable to state, and which such other persons assume obligations, and gave to said plaintiff rights and powers, and said plaintiff exercised, as to them, such rights and powers as were created by said instrument 'Exhibit 1,' and were exercised by plaintiff and its officers and directors in relation to the persons, natural or artificial, who were theretofore members of such combination and trust.

"In the further carrying out of said scheme to stifle competition; to restrain commerce between the States and Territories of the United States and with foreign countries; to unduly and unreasonably enhance prices, it was further agreed between the members of said combination and trust that the so-called 'directors' of plaintiff, being really a committee appointed, as aforesaid, by said the members of said trust or combination, should arbitrarily classify the wholesale dealers of wall paper in the United States and Territories thereof into two classes, namely, jobbers and 'road' or 'quantity' buyers; that they should further arbitrarily classify the jobbers into 'first-class' and 'second-class' and 'third-class' jobbers; that they should further arbitrarily classify the other wholesalers into 'road' or 'quantity' buyer, and 'special buyers;' that, being thus classified, they should all be compelled to sign written agreements, nominally with said company, really with said members of said combination or trust, obligating them to buy their entire stock of merchandise from said company.

"A copy of said agreement so to be signed by said jobbers is attached hereto, marked 'Exhibit 2' [which is in margin [a]] and made part hereof, the same being printed forms with blanks for names, dates, and amounts of purchases.

"To conceal the fact that it was an agreement to purchase from no one but said company, and the members of said combination and trust, the amount of purchases made by the buyer, in the previous year, from all the members of said combination or trust, being the entire amount of purchases made by such buyer, during the preceding year, was ascertained, and an amount at least double thereof, being an amount supposed to be, and which was in fact, more than, by any possibility, could be needed by such buyer, was inserted in said blank as the amount to be purchased by such buyer from the company.

"By said agreement, the prices to be paid by the jobber were fixed according to the class in which he was arbitrarily placed, at prices enumerated in schedule B, attached to said 'Exhibit 1,' and the prices at which, alone, said jobber could sell, were fixed as shown by schedule C, attached to said 'Exhibit 1.'

"Schedule A attached to said 'Exhibit 2' is the same, so far as relates to jobbers of the class with whom the agreement is made, as the corresponding provisions of schedule B, attached to said 'Exhibit 1' and schedule B, attached to 'Exhibit 2' is the same as schedule C, attached to 'Exhibit 1.' The members of said combination and trust and said plaintiff, further to carry out said agreement, compelled all other wholesale and quantity buyers to sign agreements in the form attached to this answer, marked 'Exhibit 3' [which is in the margin [b]] and filed herewith; the same being a printed form with blanks for [a] EXHIBIT 2.

An agreement made this — day of ———, in the year 1898, between the Continental Wall Paper Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York (hereinafter called the "company"), party of the first part, and ——— ———, of ——— (hereinafter called the "jobber"), party of the second part.

In consideration of the sum of $1, paid by the jobber unto the company for granting of this agreement, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and other valuable considerations, it is agreed between the parties hereto as follows:

First. That the company will sell, subject to such credit limitation as it may impose, and the jobber will purchase the entire requirements of the jobber in his business of selling wall paper for the business year ending July 1, 1899, to the amount of a gross value, without discounts, of ———, the jobber reserving to himself the right to purchase such merchandise as he may need in excess of ——— from others.

The company is to deliver the goods without additional charge f. o. b. at New York or Philadelphia, or to equalize freights from the places at which it makes deliveries to either of said cities.

Second. The jobber shall be allowed discounts at the rates shown in the accompanying schedule, marked "A," which is hereby embodied in this agreement as a part thereof.

The terms of payment to be as follows: Four months from the date of invoice, with discount at the rate of 1 per cent per month for anticipated payment; provided settlement be made within thirty days from date of shipment, either by cash or note. Invoices for all goods shipped between October 15 and March 1 to take the latter date.

Third. Attached hereto, marked "B," is a schedule of the road prices at which the company sells its goods for the term embraced in this contract to dealers other than jobbers, and also a statement of discounts allowed to such customers other than jobbers for quantity purchases, together with the terms of credit and freight allowance to which such customers are entitled.

It is an essential condition of this agreement that the jobber will not directly or indirectly sell or offer for sale any of the merchandise purchased from the company hereunder at lower prices or upon better or more favorable terms than those shown in Schedule B, the intent hereof being to assure the company against the use by the jobbers of this agreement to undersell the company.

The prompt performance by the jobber of the provisions of this agreement as to payment and otherwise is a condition precedent to exacting the continuous performance of said agreement by the company.

In witness whereof the company has caused this instrument to be executed and the jobber has hereunto set his hand, the day and year first above written.

The intent hereof is to protect you fully against being undersold by us among customers to whom you do not allow quantity discounts.

signatures, and having attached thereto the prices shown in schedule C, attached to 'Exhibit 1,' which are the list prices referred to in said agreement.

"All said agreements, 'Exhibits 1, 2, and 3,' were drawn for the purpose and with the intent of disguising the real nature of the transaction and the real purpose, as herein set forth.

"In further carrying out said combination and with said purpose and intent, agreements were made by plaintiff and the members of said combination and trust and persons, natural and artificial, in the Dominion of Canada by which each agreed not to compete with the other, nor cut prices, the Americans in Canada, the Canadians in the United States.

"On, before, and after said 1st day of July, A. D. 1898, this defendant had a large and profitable business of long standing, possessing a valuable good will, and in which they had a large capital invested, being what is generally called the business of a jobber or wholesaler of wall paper in the State of Ohio and throughout the States and Territories of the United States.

"The defendant and all other persons engaged in the wholesale wall paper business, at the beginning of each season, which commenced in September and closed the 1st of July following, according to the custom of the trade, bought from the various persons engaged in the manufacture and sale of wall paper in the United States, being the persons, members of said combination and monopoly, their stock of wall paper to be sold by them during the ensuing year, such stock to be manufactured for them from samples submitted at the beginning of said season, in wholesale lots, and those for defendant to be shipped to Cincinnati, Ohio, and there resold by defendant, from time to time, to retail dealers throughout the States of Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, and other States and Territories of the United States.

"At said time said members of said combination and trust having, by the agreements and acts aforesaid, obtained the control of the wall-paper trade throughout the United States, at once greatly advanced the price of said wall paper, and threatened defendant that, unless it signed said agreement, 'Exhibit 2,' no wall paper would be sold to it; that said combination would make it impossible for it to buy wall paper, or to continue its business, and would drive it out of its said business, and compel it to sacrifice the good will owned by it as aforesaid, and the capital invested by it in said business.

"Said combination or trust then, and from that time thereafter, until the 1st day of July, A. D. 1900, had the power, by means of said combination and said agreements, and the will, to carry out its said threats, and deprive these defendants or any person, firm, or corporation engaged in the business of selling wall paper in the United States of the power to obtain wall paper for its or their trade, and the will and the power to drive out of business any person, firm, or corporation engaged in the business of selling wall paper; deprive them of their good will, and compel them to sacrifice the capital invested in the business.

"In like manner, by the same means, all other jobbers and wholesalers of wall paper in the United States, and all persons engaged in commerce in the wall-paper trade between the several States of the Union and foreign countries, were compelled to and did sign the agreements attached to this answer as 'Exhibits 2 and 3.'

"The immediate, intended, and direct effect of the said combination and agreements was the stifling of competition between said manufacturers and vendors of wall paper and between the jobbers and wholesalers thereof, and to unduly enhance the price of wall paper, making it one-half more than the price which it would be had the same been left to free and unrestrained competition; to compel said jobbers and wholesalers to pay such unduly enhanced and unreasonable price to plaintiff and to members of said combination and to exact from others an unduly enhanced price.

"After the making of said agreements, as before, the members of such combination solicited and received orders from this defendant and all other wholesalers, filled their orders, charged the prices fixed in said schedules attached to said 'Exhibit 1,' and directed that payment for such merchandise should be made by the jobbers to said plaintiff combination for said several members of said combination and trust, to be divided in the manner aforesaid. Said combination contrived, intended, and did prevent free and unrestrained competition between the producers and between the purchasers of wall paper and between the jobbers and wholesalers of wall paper throughout the United States.

"Defendant avers that said plaintiff, and the members of said combination as aforesaid, being more than two persons, firms, corporations, partnerships, and associations, combined capital and skill for each and all of the following purposes, to wit: To create restrictions in trade and commerce; to carry out restrictions in trade and commerce; to limit the product of wall paper; to reduce the production of wall paper; to increase the price of wall paper; to prevent competition in the manufacturing and making of wall paper; to prevent competition in the sale of wall paper; to prevent competition in the purchase of wall paper; to fix a standard or figure whereby its price to the public or consumer should be controlled and established as to an article or commodity of merchandise, to wit: Wall paper intended for sale, use, and consumption in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, and Illinois; to make and enter into contracts, obligations, and agreements by which they bound themselves not to sell or dispose of wall paper below a common standard figure or fixed value; to carry out contracts, obligations, and agreements by which they bound themselves not to sell or dispose of wall paper below a common standard figure or fixed value; to make and enter into contracts, obligations, and agreements by which they agreed to keep the price of wall paper at a fixed or graduated figure; to carry out contracts, obligations, and agreements by which they agreed to keep the price of wall paper at a fixed or graduated figure; to make and enter into contracts, obligations, and agreements by which they established and settled the price of wall paper between themselves and between themselves and others, so as to both directly and indirectly preclude a free and unrestricted competition among themselves, and among themselves and purchasers, and among purchasers in the sale of wall paper; to carry out contracts, obligations, and agreements by which they established and settled the price of wall paper between themselves and themselves and others, so as to both directly and indirectly preclude a free and unrestricted competition both between themselves and between themselves and purchasers, and between purchasers in the sale of wall paper; to make and enter into contracts, obligations, and agreements by which they agreed to pool, combine, and both directly and indirectly unite the interests they had connected with the sale of wall paper so that its price might be affected; to carry out contracts, obligations, and agreements by which they agreed to pool, combine, and both directly and indirectly unite the interests that they had connected with the sale of wall paper, so that its price might be affected.

"Said contracts and agreements were each and all combinations and conspiracies in restraint of trade and commerce among the several States, and with foreign nations, and had the intent and effect of restraining trade and commerce between the several States and with foreign nations, and were an attempt, by combinations and conspiracy, between the members of said combination and trust to monopolize the trade and commerce in wall paper among the several States and with foreign nations, and, by said contracts, and the acts done by members thereof, and by said plaintiff under and in pursuance thereof said plaintiff and the said members of said combination or trust did monopolize and attempt to monopolize the trade and commerce in wall paper among the several States and with foreign nations.

"In further carrying out of said scheme and combination the members thereof delivered to this defendant, in the year from September, A. D. 1898, to September, A. D. 1899, wall paper for which this defendant paid to said plaintiff, for and per direction of the members of said combination, the sum of $144,854.14.

"These defendants aver that the prices charged in said exhibit attached to said amended petition [which are itemized accounts showing each article and the price therefor alleged to have been sold and delivered to the defendant] are the prices fixed and determined in pursuance of and by the combination or trust agreement, as above set forth, and are unreasonable, unjust, and excessive and at least one-half more than they would otherwise have been. In transacting all business aforesaid, at all said times, said business was transacted under and in pursuance of said combination or trust agreement, and for the purposes, and each of them, above specified, and not otherwise.

"The allegations in said plaintiff's petition set forth as a suit on account are an attempt to enforce, carry out, and recover upon and by virtue of said unlawful combination aforesaid the prices fixed by such combination, and the prices therein sought to be recovered for said merchandise are unreasonable, excessive, and above the fair market price of such merchandise by more than the amount so sought to be recovered.

"Each and all of the provisions of said contract and agreement between said members of said combination and each other; between said so-called 'vendors' and said plaintiff; between said members of said combination and said plaintiff and the so-called 'jobbers;' between the members of said combination and trust and said plaintiff and the so-called 'road' or 'quantity buyers,' are each and all contrary to the provisions of the statutes of the State of New York, where said plaintiff was organized; contrary to the provisions of the laws of the State of Ohio, where the merchandise was delivered; contrary to the laws of the several States where each of the members of said combinations did business; contrary to the laws of the United States; and made criminal by the laws of each of said several States and by the laws of the United States; and each and all of said agreements aforesaid are contrary to public policy, and in violation of the rights of the defendant, and injurious to the interests of the consumer and of the public."

Mr. Justice Harlan (after making the above statement) delivered the opinion of the court.

The antitrust act of 1890 declares illegal every contract, combination in the form of a trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, and also declares it to be a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, for anyone to make any such contract or to engage in any such combination or conspiracy. (Section 1.)

It is also made a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, for anyone to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations. (Section 2.)

Similar provisions were made in reference to contracts, combinations in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracies, in restraint of trade or commerce in any Territory of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or between any such Territory or another, or between any such Territory or Territories and any State or States or the District of Columbia and any State or States or foreign nations. (Section 3.)

The act further provided that any person injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful, may sue therefor in the circuit court of the United States in the district where the defendant resides or is found, without regard to the amount in controversy, and recover threefold the damages sustained by him. (Section 3. 29 Stat., 209.)

The defendant contends that under the facts admitted by the demurrer it must be taken that the Continental Wall Paper Company is the representative in this suit of a combination or trust formed for the purpose of restraining and monopolizing trade and commerce among the several States in the manufacturing, buying, selling, and dealing in wall paper; that this combination has the direct effect to accomplish that purpose; that the defendant, engaged in buying and selling wall paper in Ohio and other States, was compelled to become a party to the illegal combination or go out of business; that the account in suit was made up, as to prices and terms of sale, not upon the basis of an independent, collateral contract for goods sold and delivered, but with direct reference to, in conformity with and for the object of enforcing the agreements that constituted, or out of which came, the illegal combination whose business is carried on under the name of the Continental Wall Paper Company; that a judgment against the defendant upon the account in suit will, in effect, legally and practically aid the combination to reap the fruits of agreements that were illegal under the acts of Congress, and the making of which was declared by that act a crime; consequently, that the petition upon the facts admitted was properly dismissed.

That the combination represented by the plaintiff company is within the prohibitions of the above act of Congress is clear from the facts admitted by the demurrer. We assume, therefore, without discussion—for discussion is unnecessary—that there is a combination, of which the Continental Wall Paper Company is the representative, and that, in violation of that act, such combination was formed with the intent, and will have the effect, directly, to restrain as well as monopolize trade and commerce among the several States and with foreign nations as involved in the manufacture, sale, and transportation of wall paper among the several States and with foreign nations. This part of the case is forcibly presented by the circuit court of appeals which, in its opinion delivered by Judge Lurton, well said: "The conspiring mills were situated in many States. The consumers [of wall paper] embraced the whole citizenship of the United States. The jobbers and wholesalers, who were to be coerced into contracts to buy their entire demands from the Continental Wall Paper Company or be driven out of business, were in every State. Before the combination each of the combining companies was engaged in both state and interstate commerce. The freedom of each, with respect to prices and terms, was restrained by the agreement and interstate commerce directly affected thereby, as well as by the enhancement of prices which resulted. A more complete monopoly in an article of universal use has probably never been brought about. It may be that the wit of man may yet devise a more complete scheme to accomplish the stifling of competition. But none of the shifts resorted to for suppressing freedom of commerce and securing undue prices, shown by the reported cases, is half so complete in its details. None of the schemes with which this may be compared is more certain in results, more widespread in its operation, and more evil in its purposes. It must fall within the definition of a 'restraint of trade,' whether we confine ourselves to the common law interpretation of that term or apply that given to the term as used in the federal act." (148 Fed. Rep., 939, 947.)

But it is contended that however illegal the combination represented by the plaintiff may be, and whatever may be the effect of a judgment against the defendant, the plaintiff company is entitled to a judgment under the principles announced in Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co. (184 U. S., 540, 545.) Let us see what that case was and whether it may not be distinguished from the one now before us.

The Union Sewer Pipe Company, a corporation of Ohio, doing business in Illinois, brought suit against Connolly, a citizen of Illinois, upon promissory notes given in Illinois on account of the purchase by the defendant from that company, under contracts made in that State, of sewer pipe known as "Akron pipe." It also brought suit against one Dee, a citizen of Illinois, upon an open account for the value of similar sewer pipe sold to him under a written contract, also made in that State. In each case the defendant disputed his liability for the value of the goods obtained from the Sewer Pipe Company upon the ground that at the time of their respective purchases that company was in a combination with certain firms, corporations, and companies engaged in the manufacture of Akron pipe, which combination, it was alleged, was in illegal restraint of trade, and forbidden by the principles of the common law, as recognized and enforced both in Ohio and Illinois. The defense was also made that the Sewer Pipe Company was a combination doing business throughout the United States and between Ohio and Illinois, in the form of a trust, in restraint of trade and commerce among the several States, contrary not only to the antitrust act of Congress of July 2, 1890, c. 647, but contrary to the Illinois antitrust statute of January 1, 1893, forbidding, under penalties, the combination of capital, skill, or acts for certain specified purposes. (26 Stat., 209; Laws Ill. 1893, p. 182; Hurd's Rev. Stat. Ill. 1899, p. 618, title Criminal Code.)

The defense, based upon the principles of the common law, was overruled in the Connolly case, the court saying: "Assuming, as defendants contend, that the alleged combination was illegal if tested by the principles of the common law, still it would not follow that they could, at common law, refuse to pay for pipe bought by them under special contracts with the plaintiff. The illegality of such combination did not prevent the plaintiff corporation from selling pipe that it obtained from its constituent companies, or either of them. It could pass a title by a sale to any one desiring to buy, and the buyer could not justify a refusal to pay for what he bought and received by proving that the seller had previously, in the prosecution of its business, entered into an illegal combination with others in reference, generally, to the sale of Akron pipe." Again, after referring to several cases establishing the general principle that a court will not lend assistance to carry out the terms of an illegal contract, and that one purchasing and receiving goods under a contract, expressed or implied, to pay for them, can not refuse to pay simply because of the illegal character of his vendor, the court proceeded: "In the present [Connolly] case other considerations must control. This is not an action to enforce or which involves the enforcement of the alleged arrangement or combination between the plaintiff corporation and other corporations, firms, and companies in relation to the sale of Akron pipe. As already suggested, the plaintiff, even if part of a combination illegal at common law, was not for that reason forbidden to sell property it acquired or held for sale. The purchases by the defendants had no necessary or direct connection with the alleged illegal combination; for the contracts between the defendants and the plaintiff could have been proven without any reference to the arrangement whereby the latter became an illegal combination. If, according to the principles of the common law, the Union Sewer Pipe Company could not have sold or passed title to any pipe it received and held for sale, because of an illegal arrangement previously made with other corporations, firms, or companies, a different question would be presented. But we are aware of no decision to the effect that a sale similar to that made by the present plaintiff to the defendants respectively would, in itself, be illegal or void under the principles of the common law. The contracts between the plaintiff and the respective defendants were, in every sense, collateral to the alleged agreement between the plaintiff and the other corporations, firms, or associations whereby an illegal combination was formed for the sale of sewer pipe."

Turning to the defense based on the antitrust act of Congress, the court, in the Connolly case, said: "Much of what has just been said in reference to the first special defense, based on the common law, is applicable to this part of the case. If the contract between the plaintiff corporation and the other named corporations, persons, and companies, or the combination thereby formed, was illegal under the act of Congress, then all those, whether persons, corporations, or associations, directly connected therewith became subject to the penalties prescribed by Congress. But the act does not declare illegal or void any sale made by such combination, or by its agents, of property it acquired or which came into its possession for the purpose of being sold, such property not being at the time in the course of transportation from one State to another or to a foreign country. The buyer could not refuse to comply with his contract of purchase upon the ground that the seller was an illegal combination which might be restrained or suppressed in the mode prescribed by the act of Congress; for Congress did not declare that a combination illegally formed under the act of 1890 should not, in the conduct of its business, become the owner of property which it might sell to whomsoever wished to buy it. So that there is no necessary legal connection here between the sale of pipe to the defendants by the plaintiff corporation and the alleged arrangement made by it with other corporations, companies, and firms. The contracts under which the pipe in question was sold were, as already said, collateral to the arrangement for the combination referred to, and this is not an action to enforce the terms of such arrangement. That combination may have been illegal, and yet the sale to the defendants was valid." Further: "Nor can the defendants refuse to pay for what they bought upon the ground that the seventh section of the Sherman Act gives the right to any person 'injured in his business or property by any other person or corporation by reason of anything forbidden or declared to be unlawful' by the act, to sue and recover treble the damage sustained by him. We shall not now attempt to declare the full scope and meaning of that section of the act of Congress. It is sufficient to say that the action which it authorizes must be a direct one, and the damages claimed can not be set off in these actions based upon special contracts for the sale of pipe that have no direct connection with the alleged arrangement or combination between the plaintiff and other corporations, firms, or companies. Such damages can not be said, as matter of law, to have directly grown out of that arrangement or combination, and are, besides, unliquidated. Besides, it is well settled in Illinois that 'unliquidated damages arising out of covenants, contracts, or torts disconnected with plaintiff's claim can not be set off under the statute.'"

We need not here refer to that part of the Connolly case relating to the defense based on the antitrust act of Illinois, for the court adjudged that act to be void because of a certain provision in it which, contrary to the Constitution of the United States, denied the equal protection of the laws to all persons within the jurisdiction of the State, except a named favored class.

The present case is plainly distinguishable from the Connolly case. In that case the defendant, who sought to avoid payment for the goods purchased by him under contract, had no connection with the general business or operations of the alleged illegal corporation that sold the goods. He had nothing whatever to do with the formation of that corporation, and could not participate in the profits of its business. His contract was to take certain goods at an agreed price, nothing more, and was not in itself illegal, nor part of nor in execution of any general plan or scheme that the law condemned. The contract of purchase was wholly collateral to and independent of the agreement under which the combination had been previously formed by others in Ohio. It was the case simply of a corporation that dealt with an entire stranger to its management and operations and sold goods that it owned to one who wished to buy them. In short, the defense in the Connolly case was that the plaintiff corporation, although owning the pipe in question and having authority to sell and pass title to the property, was precluded by reason alone of its illegal character from having a judgment against the purchaser. We held that that defense could not be sustained either upon the principles of the common law or under the antitrust act of Congress.

The case now before us is an entirely different one. The Continental Wall Paper Company seeks, in legal effect, the aid of the court to enforce a contract for the sale and purchase of goods which, it is admitted by the demurrer, was in fact and was intended by the parties to be based upon agreements that were and are essential parts of an illegal scheme. We state the matter in this way, because the plaintiff by its demurrer admits, for the purposes of this case, the truth of all the facts alleged in the third defense. It is admitted by the demurrer to that defense that the account sued on has been made up in execution of the agreements that constituted or out of which came the illegal combination formed for the purpose and with effect of both restraining and monopolizing trade and commerce among the several States.

The present suit is not based upon an implied contract of the defendant company to pay a reasonable price for goods that it purchased, but upon agreements, to which both the plaintiff and the defendant were parties, and pursuant to which the accounts sued on were made out, and which had for their object, and which it is admitted had directly the effect, to accomplish the illegal ends for which the Continental Wall Paper Company was organized. If judgment be given for the plaintiff, the result beyond all question will be to give the aid of the court in making effective the illegal agreements that constituted the forbidden combination. These considerations make it evident that the present case is different from the Connolly case. In that case the court regarded the record as presenting the question whether a voluntary purchaser of goods at stipulated prices, under a collateral, independent contract, can escape an obligation to pay for them upon the ground merely that the seller, which owned the goods, was an illegal combination or trust. We held that he could not, and nothing more touching that question was decided or intended to be decided in the Connolly case. The question here is whether the plaintiff company can have judgment upon an account which, it is admitted by demurrer, was made up, within the knowledge of both seller and buyer, with direct reference to and in execution of certain agreements under which an illegal combination, represented by the seller, was organized. Stated shortly, the present case is this: The plaintiff comes into court admitting that it is an illegal combination, whose operations restrain and monopolize commerce and trade among the States, and asks a judgment that will give effect, as far as it goes, to agreements that constituted that combination, and by means of which the combination proposes to accomplish forbidden ends. We hold that such a judgment can not be granted without departing from the statutory rule, long established in the jurisprudence of both this country and England, that a court will not lend its aid in any way to a party seeking to realize the fruits of an agreement that appears to be tainted with illegality, although the result of applying that rule may sometimes be to shield one who has got something for which, as between man and man, he ought, perhaps, to pay, but for which he is unwilling to pay.

In such cases the aid of the court is denied, not for the benefit of the defendant, but because public policy demands that it should be denied without regard to the interests of individual parties. It is of no consequence that the present defendant company had knowledge of the alleged illegal combination and its plans or was directly or indirectly a party thereto. Its interest must be put out of view altogether when it is sought to have the assistance of the court in accomplishing ends forbidden by the law.

In Hanauer v. Doane (12 Wall., 342, 349), this court said: "The whole doctrine of avoiding contracts for illegality and immorality is founded on public policy. It is certainly contrary to public policy to give the aid of the courts to a vendor who knew that his goods were purchased, or to a lender who knew that his money was borrowed, for the purpose of being employed in the commission of a criminal act, injurious to society or to any of its members."

In McMullen v. Hoffman (174 U. S., 639, 654, 669), where the authorities are reviewed and the whole subject carefully examined, the court said: "The authorities, from the earliest time to the present, unanimously hold that no court will lend its assistance in any way toward carrying out the terms of an illegal contract"—citing many English and American cases. "The court refuses to enforce such a contract, and it permits defendant to set up its illegality, not out of any regard for the defendant who sets it up, but only on account of the public interest. It has been often stated in similar cases that the defense is a very dishonest one, and it lies ill in the mouth of the defendant to allege it, and it is only allowed for public considerations and in order the better to secure the public against dishonest transactions. To refuse to grant either party to an illegal contract judicial aid for the enforcement of his alleged rights under it tends strongly toward reducing the number of such transactions to a minimum. The more plainly parties understand that when they enter into contracts of this nature they place themselves outside the protection of the law, so far as that protection consists in aiding them to enforce such contracts, the less inclined will they be to enter into them. In that way the public secures the benefit of a rigid adherence to the law." In that case the principle announced in Coppell v. Hall (7 Wall., 542, 548) was reaffirmed, namely: "Whenever the illegality appears, whether the evidence comes from one side or the other, the disclosure is fatal to the case. No consent of the defendant can neutralize its effect. A stipulation, in the most solemn form, to waive the objection would be tainted with the vice of the original contract and void for the same reason. Wherever the contamination reaches, it destroys. The principle to be extracted from all the cases is that the law will not lend its support to a claim founded upon its violation.

In Embrey v. Jemison (131 U. S., 336, 348) the defendant, who was sued upon promissory given in execution of a previous verbal contract that was illegal, this court said that he could not "be permitted to withdraw attention from this feature of the transaction by the device of obtaining notes for the amount claimed under the illegal agreement; for they are not founded on any new or independent consideration, but are only written promises to pay that which the obligor had verbally agreed to pay. They do not, in any just sense, constitute a distinct or collateral contract based upon a valid consideration. Nor do they represent anything of value in the hands of the defendant which, in good conscience, belongs to the plaintiff or to his firm. Although the burden of proof is on the obligor to show the real consideration, the execution of the notes could not obliterate the substantive fact that they grew immediately out of and are directly connected with a wagering contract. They must, therefore, be regarded as tainted with the illegality of that contract, the benefits of which the plaintiff seeks to obtain by this suit. That the defendant executed the notes with full knowledge of all the facts is of no moment. The defense he makes is not allowed for his sake, but to maintain the policy of the law." (Coppell v. Wall, 7 Wall, 542, 558.)

In Montague & Co. v. Lowry (193 U. S., 38, 45, 46), which involved, in part, the question whether a particular contract made in California for the purchase of tiles related to interstate commerce and was illegal, the court said: "The provision as to this sale is but a part of the agreement, and it is so united with the rest as to be incapable of separation without at the same time altering the general purpose of the agreement. The whole agreement is to be construed as one piece, in which the manufacturers are parties, as well as the San Francisco dealers, and the refusal to sell on the part of the manufacturers is connected with and a part of the scheme which includes the enhancement of the price of the unset tiles by the San Francisco dealers. The whole thing is so bound together that when looked at as a whole the sale of unset tiles ceases to be a mere transaction in the State of California and becomes a part of a purpose which, when carried out, amounts to and is a contract or combination in restraint of interstate trade or commerce." So, in Swift & Co. v. United States (196 U. S., 375, 396): "The scheme as a whole seems to us to be within reach of the law. The constituent elements, as we have stated them, are enough to give to the scheme a body and, for all that we can say, to accomplish it. Moreover, whatever we may think of them separately, when we take them up as distinct charges they are alleged sufficiently as elements of the scheme. It is suggested that the several acts charged are lawful and that intent can make no difference. But they are bound together as the parts of a single plan. The plan may make the parts unlawful. (Aikens v. Wisconsin, 195 U. S., 194, 206.)"

In Bement v. National Harrow Company (186 U. S.) 70, 87, 88, the court, after referring to that section of the act of Congress relating to suits by the Attorney-General and by persons injured in their business or property, said: "Assuming that the plaintiff is right so far as regards any suit brought under that act, we are nevertheless of opinion that anyone sued upon a contract may set up as a defense that it is a violation of the act of Congress, and if found to be so, that fact will constitute a good defense to the action. The first section of the act provides that 'every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations is hereby declared to be illegal.' Every person making such a contract is deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction is to be punished by fine or by imprisonment, or both. As the statute makes the contract in itself illegal, no recovery can be had upon it when the defense of illegality is shown to the court. The act provides for the prevention of violations thereof and makes it the duty of the several district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney-General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations, and it gives to any person injured in his business or property the right to sue, but that does not prevent a private individual when sued upon a contract which is void as in violation of the act from setting it up as a defense, and we think when proved it is a valid defense to any claim made under a contract thus denounced as illegal."

Again, in the recent case of Loewe v. Lawlor (208 U. S., 274, 301), which involved the inquiry whether certain acts could be regarded as in restraint of interstate commerce, the court said: "So that, although some of the means whereby the interstate traffic was to be destroyed were acts within a State, and some of them were in themselves as a part of their obvious purpose and effect beyond the scope of federal authority, still, as we have seen, the acts must be considered as a whole, and the plan is open to condemnation, notwithstanding a negligible amount of intrastate business might be affected in carrying it out. If the purpose of the combination was, as alleged, to prevent any interstate transportation at all, the fact that the means operated at the one end before physical transportation commenced, and at the other end after the physical transportation ended, was immaterial." (See also Gibbs v. Baltimore Gas Co., 130 U. S., 396, 412.)

The adjudged cases all hold that upon the question whether the particular contract sought to be enforced arises out of an illegal transaction the court will not be restricted to a partial statement of the facts, but will consider all the circumstances connected with the transaction, so as to ascertain its real nature. In Addyston Pipe and Steel Company v. United States (175 U. S., 211, 247) the court said that "all the facts and circumstances are, however, to be considered in order to determine the fundamental question whether the necessary effect of the combination is to restrain interstate commerce."

Upon the whole case, and without further citation of authorities, we adjudge, upon the admitted facts, that the combination, represented by the plaintiff in this case, was illegal under the antitrust act of 1890; that it is to be taken as one intended, and which will have the effect directly, to restrain and monopolize trade and commerce among the several States and with foreign States; and that the plaintiff can not have a judgment for the amount of the account sued on, because, for the reasons we have stated, such a judgment would, in effect, aid the execution of the agreements which constituted that illegal combination. We consequently hold that the circuit court of appeals properly sustained the third defense, and rightly dismissed the suit. Its judgment must be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

Clerk Supreme Court, United States.

ADMISSION TO THE GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I call up for consideration the bill H. R. 12898.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of postponing consideration of that bill. I desire to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not believe that motion is in order at this time.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. OLCOTT. The bill has not been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12898) to change the proceedings for admission to the Government Hospital for the Insane, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAY. I want to know whether or not I can move in the Committee of the Whole that the committee recommend to the House to postpone the consideration of this bill until the 22d day of February?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman did not make that motion.

Mr. HAY. Well, I was going to make it, but the Chair cut me off.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of consideration would take precedence.

Mr. HAY. I understand that; but I am making the parliamentary inquiry of whether I can make that motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that after the bill has been reported and general debate has been had, a motion could be made to recommend to the House postponement to a certain day.

Mr. HAY. After general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. After general debate.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter proceedings for admission to the Government Hospital for the Insane of insane persons residing in the District of Columbia, and for admission to said hospital of nonresident insane persons found in said District, shall be commenced by petition presented in open court to the justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, holding a special term for orphans' court business, stating the facts necessary for admission to said hospital, as heretofore provided by law, such petition to be signed and sworn to by some responsible resident of the District of Columbia; but such petition shall not be filed until the court shall be satisfied as to the responsibility and residence of the person signing and swearing to the same and shall make and enter an order directing the filing of such petition.

SEC. 2. That the order of such court directing the filing of the petition shall fix a time for the hearing of such application and shall require copies thereof to be served on the alleged lunatic and on the Commissioners of the District of Columbia at least one day preceding the time fixed for such hearing, and a copy of such order, duly authenticated, shall be inscribed on each of said copies before service thereof. A copy of such order shall also be served upon the husband or wife, father or mother, or next of kin of such alleged insane person, if there be any such known to be residing within the District of Columbia, and if not, upon the person with whom such alleged insane person may reside or at whose house he or she may be, or such other person as the justice, in his discretion, may name, at least one day preceding the time fixed for such hearing.

SEC. 3. That so soon as may be after the filing of the petition the court shall appoint two or more physicians resident in the District of Columbia, graduates of an incorporated medical college, who shall have been in the actual practice of their profession at least three years and who shall not be in any way connected with or have any interest in the Government Hospital for the Insane or be a relative of the person alleged to be insane or of the person making the petition hereinbefore mentioned, to examine the person alleged in the petition to be insane, which physicians shall make such examination within the period of five days preceding the time set for the hearing and shall testify, under oath, as to the mental condition of the person alleged to be insane. Such physicians shall be allowed a per diem compensation, to be fixed by the court, of not exceeding $10, to be paid by the District of Columbia on the certificate of the court that the account for such service is just and correct, and other witnesses examined on such application shall be paid by the District of Columbia the fees and allowances prescribed by law for witnesses summoned in behalf of the United States, and all other costs of the proceedings shall be paid by the District of Columbia: Provided, That in the case of nonindigent persons all costs of the proceeding shall be defrayed out of the estate of such person, and a deposit shall be paid into the court sufficient to cover such costs. The request for admission to said hospital shall be made within five days after the entry of the order of the court. The provisions of the act of April 27, 1904, providing for temporary commitments to the Government Hospital for the Insane are hereby extended, so far as applicable, to nonindigent insane persons residing in the District of Columbia, as well as to nonresident insane persons found in said District.

SEC. 4. That the court shall require the presence of the alleged lunatic at the hearing of the application, unless for good reason it shall direct otherwise by an order stating such reason; and upon such hearing the court shall hear the testimony introduced by the parties and render a decision in writing as to the alleged lunatic's insanity. That in case the said lunatic shall have property, the court shall, in its order of commitment, direct the committee of said lunatic to pay to said hospital such amount per month as may be deemed by the court just and reasonable toward defraying the expenses of the board and maintenance of such lunatic; but if such insane person shall be indigent, or shall not have more than enough property to support his family dependent upon him for support, the expenses of his board and maintenance in the hospital shall be paid by the District of Columbia, as now provided by law.

SEC. 5. That the order of the court on the hearing of the application on the petition and the evidence shall be made without an inquisition by jury, and all the proceedings under the petition shall be entered in the minutes of the court: Provided, however, That the justice to whom application is made may, if no demand is made for a hearing, proceed forthwith to determine the question of insanity, and if satisfied that the alleged insane person is insane may immediately issue an order for commitment to the Government Hospital for the Insane: And provided further, That, upon demand of any relative or near friend in behalf of such alleged insane person, the judge shall, or he may upon his own motion, issue an order directing the hearing of such application before him at a time not more than five days from the date of such order, which shall be served upon the persons upon whom the petition is hereinbefore directed to be served, and upon such other person as the justice, in his discretion, may name, and upon such day, or upon such other day to which the proceeding shall be regularly adjourned, the justice shall hear the testimony introduced by the parties and examine the alleged insane person, if deemed advisable, in or out of court, and render a decision in writing as to such person's insanity. If it be determined that such person is insane, the justice shall forthwith issue an order committing him to the Government Hospital for the Insane: And provided further, That the court may, in its discretion, call a jury to determine the question of insanity: And provided further, That if a person ordered to be committed pursuant to the provisions of this act, or any relative or friend in his behalf, is dissatisfied with the final order of a justice committing him, he may, within ten days after the making of such order, appeal therefrom to a justice of the supreme court other than the justice making the order, who shall cause a jury to be summoned and shall try the question of such insanity, in which event the proceedings shall be in accordance with the provisions of section 115a of the Code of Laws of the District of Columbia relating to lunacy proceedings embodied in the act of Congress approved June 30, 1902: And provided further, That the jury to be used shall be impaneled by the United States marshal of said District, upon the order of the court, from jurors in attendance upon the courts of said District, who shall perform such service in addition to and as part of their duties in said courts: And provided further, That during such time as jurors are not in attendance upon said courts the court may direct said marshal to impanel the jurors in attendance upon the police court in said District, who shall perform such duties in addition to and as a part of their duties in said police court, or said court may direct a special jury to be summoned for such inquisition; and if the verdict of the jury be that such person is insane, the justice shall certify that fact and make an order of commitment as upon the original hearing, and such order shall be presented, at the time of the commitment of such insane person, to the superintendent of the Government Hospital for the Insane. Proceedings under the order shall not be stayed pending an appeal therefrom except upon an order of a justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and made upon a notice and after a hearing, with provisions made therein for such temporary care or confinement of the alleged insane person as may be deemed necessary.

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, so soon as practicable, to return to their places of residence or to their friends all indigent insane persons not residing in the District of Columbia at the time they become insane who are now or hereafter may be detained in the Government Hospital for the Insane, or who shall be committed to the said hospital to be temporarily cared for, and all necessary expenses incurred by the commissioners in ascertaining the locality where such persons or their friends belong and in returning them to such locality shall be defrayed by the District of Columbia.

SEC. 7. That all provisions of law inconsistent with this act be, and the same hereby are, repealed.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out of page 1, line 9, the words "a special term for orphans' court business" and insert in lieu thereof the word "probate."

Strike out of page 1, line 12, the word "some" and insert in lieu thereof the words "at least three," and change the word "resident," in the same line, to the plural.

Strike out of page 7, line 7, the word "become" and insert in lieu thereof the word "became."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I demand that the question of consideration be put.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has raised the question of consideration. The Chair ruled that the bill ought first to be read. The gentleman from Texas now renews the question of consideration.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OLCOTT. Can the gentleman raise the question of consideration until after general debate has been had?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the question of consideration should be raised before the general debate, under the theory that, if it is in order at all, it is in the interest of the saving of the time of the committee; and if the time is to be saved, and the majority of the committee are hostile to the consideration of the bill, action should be had upon that question first.

Mr. OLCOTT. Is the question of consideration a debatable one?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable. The question is, Shall the bill be now considered?

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 29.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will ascertain. [After counting.] One hundred and four Members present; a quorum.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. SMITH of Michigan and Mr. HENRY of Texas.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 38.

Accordingly the committee voted to consider the bill.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration is one that was prepared after information had been obtained in the investigation of the Government Hospital for the Insane. Those who are committed to that hospital come from the army and navy and the Marine Corps. It is also the only asylum in the District of Columbia to which the people in the District can be committed.

This bill changes the method of procedure in the commitment of insane persons from the District of Columbia. It does not in any way alter or amend the method of procedure prescribed by the statutes for the commitment of soldiers, sailors, or marines. In the army commitments are made through the War Department and in the navy through the Navy Department, upon the recommendation of army or navy surgeons.

In all other cases, as the law now stands, a trial of the alleged insane person is compulsory before a jury of 12 men in every case. The principal change that is made by the present bill is to make a jury trial optional with the person claimed to be insane, or with the relative or next friend of such person; or, if the judge making the committal order deems it necessary, he may on his own motion direct a jury trial.

The bill provides that three citizens of the District of Columbia shall sign a petition in proper form, which is presented to the judge sitting in a court of equity, who then has the power to order the insane person brought before him. He must take the testimony of at least two reputable physicians; he sees the patient; and if in his mind there is any doubt about the question of the patient's unsoundness of mind, he may of his own motion order a jury trial. If he does not think it necessary, but thinks that the person is so certainly insane as to make unnecessary the unpleasant publicity, then the relative or next friend of the unfortunate person may demand a jury trial; and under those circumstances the judge must order a trial before 12 jurymen. Of course, the same right is given to the person alleged to be insane.

One of the great reasons for the introduction of this bill is because it has been found from long experience that jury trials in many cases work most serious hardships by reason of the unfortunate publicity given to the patient.

Heretofore and now insane people in this District are tried as if they were criminals, and the jurymen that are drawn for these cases are taken from a list of jurymen in the criminal court. This bill is an attempt—and I believe it will be a successful attempt, if the bill passes—to treat the insane person as a sick person. You might as well, in the opinion of those who are experts in the knowledge of it, say that if one has a contagious disease one must be arrested and confined, and a jury of laymen must determine whether it is a case of typhoid fever or simple malaria.

I would say, in connection with this matter, that in the report there will be found an excerpt of the law of the several States of this Union, and a list of 43 States have been examined by the committee and have been tabulated. Of the 43 States, there are only 8 States that make a jury trial necessary in all cases. Comparisons of States, I appreciate, are odious; but I will say that there is no jury trial made necessary in New York, none in Illinois, none in California, and strangely enough, notwithstanding the remarks that were made by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] a few days ago, who said that this proposed law was the most outrageous law that had ever been suggested—strangely enough, in his own State of Florida commitments can be made by a justice of the peace.

There is no doubt, at least I think there can be no doubt, in the mind of anyone who will take the trouble to go over the testimony in the investigation of this matter as to the great propriety of not compelling jury trial in every case.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLCOTT. For a question.

Mr. NORRIS. On the first page of the bill there is a provision made as to how the case shall be commenced, in which it says:

It must be by petition presented to a justice of the supreme court holding equity court.

Now, will it not often happen that there will be no equity court in session?

Mr. OLCOTT. The equity court is permanently in session. That amendment proposed by us was made after we had consulted the corporation counsel of this District.

Mr. NORRIS. The equity court, the gentleman says, is always open?

Mr. OLCOTT. Always open, so there need never be any delay in the proper care of these people.

Mr. KEIFER. The court can always open on the equity side.

Mr. NORRIS. If it is always open, it follows that there is always one of the supreme court justices in the District.

Mr. OLCOTT. That is unquestionably so, and it would probably be the judge who is holding chambers. In this District all the supreme court judges have equity jurisdiction.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not know that they were in session all the time.

Mr. OLCOTT. Some of them are here all the time and are holding court in chambers.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, on page 3 there is a provision, beginning at line 17, with a proviso that in case of nonindigent persons the costs of the proceedings shall be defrayed out of the estate of such persons. And it provides that a deposit shall be paid into court sufficient to cover such costs.

Now, I suppose the intention is to require a deposit on the part of the person who is charged with being insane.

Mr. OLCOTT. No; the people filing the petition would put up a sufficient amount, and if there were a civil proceeding upon it, taken under an entirely different law, the cost and care of that person would be chargeable to his own estate.

Mr. NORRIS. The idea that struck me as strange was requiring the defendant in the court to put up costs.

Mr. OLCOTT. Not the defendant, but the petitioners put up the costs. It says in case of nonindigent persons the costs of proceedings shall be defrayed out of the estate of such person, and a sufficient deposit made, and so forth.

Mr. NORRIS. The nonindigent person is the petitioner?

Mr. OLCOTT. Not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, it means the insane person?

Mr. OLCOTT. The nonindigent person who is thought to be insane is not the petitioner.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, you are going to charge the insane person with putting up the costs in advance.

Mr. OLCOTT. No; the petitioner puts up the costs, makes the deposit. The person is not declared insane until after the proceeding. After the person is found to be insane and a nonindigent person, the money would come from the estate of that person, but the deposit would be put in by the petitioners; of course, it would eventually come out of the estate if the person was declared insane.

Mr. NORRIS. You say in this proposed law that the costs will be paid out of the estate of such person, and that means the person charged with being insane. Then you require that a deposit shall be paid, and so forth.

Mr. OLCOTT. By whom? Not by the defendant, but by the petitioner, the person who starts the proceedings.

Mr. NORRIS. That would seem to me to be reasonable.

Mr. OLCOTT. No one else could do it.

Mr. NORRIS. But at the same time, it seems to me, there is a defect in this law in the fact that the language does not make that plain.

Mr. OLCOTT. No one else could do it.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see how a crazy person could do it, but it seems to me that this law attempts to make him do that. I assure the gentleman that I am not attempting to criticise the bill. I am only trying to get at the right phraseology.

Mr. OLCOTT. I only want to make clear to the gentleman that when it says a deposit shall be required, of course the person who takes the initiative to start the proceedings must make that deposit. This proceeding is in the nature of being against the person who is thought to be insane.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand the gentleman's explanation perfectly well, as to what his idea is.

Mr. OLCOTT. I think that is what the language expresses.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me, in reading the language, it does not appear to read that way. I think the gentleman ought to provide that this deposit should be made by the petitioner.

Mr. OLCOTT. That the deposit shall be paid into court sufficient to cover such costs by the petitioner or petitioners?

Mr. NORRIS. That would make it plain.

Mr. OLCOTT. How can one expect a person who is a defendant to be forced in any way——

Mr. NORRIS. I do not expect him to be, and that is the reason I call attention to this particular provision that seems to me to attempt to enforce an insane person to put up the money.

Mr. OLCOTT. The gentleman, at the proper time, may make that amendment if he chooses.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. KEIFER. Following up the very subject of inquiry made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I want to know if some person should institute under this bill, if it should become a law, a proceeding to adjudge another insane, and the question should be tried by a jury, and after great expense it should be adjudged that the person was not insane, but was held to be of sound mind, does the bill still require that his estate shall pay all the costs of that proceeding?

Mr. OLCOTT. Absolutely not.

Mr. KEIFER. Where is the provision that cuts that off?

Mr. OLCOTT. The provision is in the general law of the District of Columbia. If the person were adjudged insane and he had property, a committee would be appointed and his estate would pay the costs. The gentleman from Ohio certainly appreciates that if in a civil case a plaintiff brings action and a man is brought into court as a defendant, and the plaintiff does not establish his case, the defendant has costs against the plaintiff. That is the only answer I can make to that.

Mr. KEIFER. That answer is not satisfactory at all; first, because this is not in its character an adversary proceeding with parties plaintiff and defendant; and second, because——

Mr. OLCOTT. I did not yield to the gentleman from Ohio for a speech. If he has any further question to ask, I will listen.

Mr. KEIFER. I will come to that in a moment. My reply to this is that the bill provides in this language: That in the case of nonindigent persons all costs of the proceedings shall be defrayed out of the estate of such persons. If that be so, then it is the case when he is found to be of sound mind as well as when he is adjudged to be insane.

Mr. OLCOTT. I will answer the question. Mr. Chairman, in that regard, the petitioner, of course, makes a deposit of the costs, and if the petitioner has not made good and the man is declared to be of sound mind, of course the law of every community——

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. OLCOTT. I will not yield any more.

Mr. KEIFER. But the gentleman's own bill says to the contrary.

Mr. OLCOTT. The law of any community would naturally give to the defendant the costs, because he has been successful in his suit.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. OLCOTT. I will not yield at all until I have finished my statement. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say further in regard to this bill that it is not one that has been entered into lightly and inadvisedly. The bill has the approval of all of the experts on insanity who were examined at the time of the investigation of the Government Hospital for the Insane.

It has the approval of Judge William A. Maury, of the board of visitors. It has the approval of a gentleman who came here and was examined, the Hon. James McGregor Smith, who has been for eight years appointed under three different governors of the State of New York the president of the board of managers of the greatest hospitals in New York State. He is not only a man who is competent by reason of this important position in the State, but he is a trained and skillful lawyer, and has for years been the editor and reviewer of Abbott's Digest, which is the most important digest in the legal world in the State of New York. I merely mention that to show that we have carefully considered this. I might also say the Society of Mental and Nervous Diseases have approved of this bill; the committee on public health, Washington Board of Trade; and of course the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the Chamber of Commerce, the corporation counsel, and Mr. Justice Barnard. The matter of the constitutional question as to the right of jury trial came up, and in an opinion of great learning, most exhaustively written by Judge Barnard, of the supreme court of the District (which opinion is printed in the report), the court has spoken at length of the distress that comes from the publicity of a jury trial and of the complete conservation of the right of the person who is unfortunate enough to be thought by some people to be insane. Just realize, if you please, that if a child is born an idiot and if that child lives for a considerable length of time and something happens so it is impossible for it to get the care of its family, the child can not be committed without being brought down to the same court-house where criminals are tried and committed after an inquest by a jury of twelve laymen. Under those circumstances, I think the committee has brought in a bill that should carry the approval of this House, and I hope that its passage may be secured. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it is not often I take the time of the House or committee in discussing matters pertaining to the District of Columbia, and would not do so on this occasion if I were not thoroughly convinced that this is one of the most objectionable and, I may say, odious measures ever presented since I have been a Member of this body. In my remarks this afternoon I am not appealing to gentlemen alone on this side of the House, but on the other as well. I am not invoking a strict construction of any constitutional clause, but do wish to deliberately call the attention of Members to a few objectionable features of this measure. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, the bill proposes to change a law as it exists in the District of Columbia. Under the present statute no person can be arraigned in any court of the District and tried for lunacy without a jury. Such provision of the present law is mandatory. But it is proposed by this measure to practically abrogate trial by jury in lunacy cases. The gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT] has failed to give any reason why the lunacy statute should be changed. Why the necessity of changing the law as it exists which gives to the unfortunate demented creature the right of trial by jury? The gentleman states in his argument that this is not a criminal proceeding, and therefore does not violate the provisions of the Constitution which guarantee trial by jury in criminal cases. Whether it be a criminal procedure or not, Mr. Chairman, it is a most solemn proceeding to take a citizen of the District of Columbia into the courts of the District and deprive him of his property and liberty without due process of law. It can not with constitutional warrant be done. The gentleman states that he has run through the statutes of 46 States of the Union and in only 8 is the right of trial by jury a mandatory provision of law. Let me say to him and you, if you search those statutes again, it will be found that in most cases to which he alludes the provisions are for only temporary disposition of the lunatic.

It does not apply to permanent disposition of his property and jeopardy of his liberty. What are the provisions of the bill? In the first place, it is proposed that "three residents of the District of Columbia" may go before a justice of the supreme court and ask for the trial of an alleged lunatic. Three citizens of the District of Columbia, whether they be interested or disinterested! Mr. Chairman, what occurs next? It is provided that the judge may set the case down for hearing, giving the party charged with lunacy one day's notice to appear and defend himself. But this is not all. It is not even made mandatory that the alleged lunatic shall be brought before the court when the question of his sanity is to be determined. It authorizes a court of the District to order a petition filed by citizens of the District, and the party charged not in the presence of the court. Without a jury the court may dispose of his property and take his liberty, while he may not be within 5 miles of the court room. He may not even know of the proceeding. Under this law the judge simply enters an order that it is not necessary for the party charged to be present.

Mr. TIRRELL. Is there any provision in this bill for medical testimony at such a hearing? Must there not be provision made for the testimony of physicians?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. There is a provision further on for witnesses. I am taking it up now, section by section, and showing you how it is proposed to proceed to dispose of a lunatic in the District of Columbia. I want to be entirely fair on the question. There are some bad features in this bill that ought not to become law, and I will leave it to any lawyer or right-thinking Member of the House of Representatives that there are perfidious proposals here as to property and freedom.

In section 4 we find:

That the court shall require the presence of the alleged lunatic at the hearing of the application, unless for good reasons it shall direct otherwise by an order stating such reasons.

A monstrous doctrine, indeed shameful!

Authorizing a petition to be filed against the lunatic, allowing the case to be set down for hearing, and then putting it within the power of "the judge to enter some reason" why he shall not be present when his property is to be taken from him and he is to be confined in an asylum. All this in his absence. No day in court; not even knowledge that he is charged. The statute will be obnoxious to the Constitution. A provision almost identical with this was placed in the statutes of the State of Missouri some years ago, and afterwards, when property rights were involved, the question being litigated in the courts, the supreme court of Missouri held the law unconstitutional in that it did not require and make it mandatory that the accused lunatic should be brought into the presence of the court when his sanity was to be determined. And why not? By the last clause of the provision read you authorize the court to determine in advance that this person, accused of lunacy, is insane. The court is permitted to enter such an order in his minutes and dispense with the presence of the person charged, who is more interested than anyone else.

Gentlemen, that provision conflicts with the Constitution. It plainly permits the property of a citizen of the District of Columbia to be taken from him without due process of law.

Let us proceed further. Such is the first way in which you can institute proceedings for lunacy under this new law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, when this bill again comes up I shall endeavor to analyze it and demonstrate that it contains many more outrageous, cruel, and truly monstrous propositions.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reserve the rest of my hour.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OVERSTREET, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had considered various bills from the Committee on the District of Columbia; that upon the bill S. 5429, entitled "An act to facilitate the use for manufacturing purposes of square No. 328, in the city of Washington, as authorized in the act of Congress of February 1, 1907," the committee recommended that the same be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia with instructions; also that several other bills, some with amendments and some without amendments, had been considered and reported favorably with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bills do pass.

VETO MESSAGE—LIEUT. COMMANDER KENNETH M'ALPINE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States (H. Doc. No. 1429), which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without approval House bill No. 16927, entitled "An act for the relief of Lieut. Commander Kenneth McAlpine," for the reasons set forth in the report of the Secretary of the Navy, as follows:

"The department returns herewith H. R. 16927, an act for the relief of Lieut. Commander Kenneth McAlpine, forwarded with your letter of the 4th instant, and recommends that it be not approved, for the following reasons:

"A. This officer left the service July 17, 1903, as the result of indulgence in the use of alcohol intoxicants to such an extent as to render him morally unfit for promotion.

"B. Exceptional consideration has already been shown him in the act of March 3, 1905 (33 Stat., 992), in pursuance of which he was restored to the navy and immediately promoted to the grade for which he had formerly failed to qualify.

"C. The proposed legislation would confer upon him all the benefits to which he would have been entitled but for his own misconduct.

"D. Should this bill become a law, it would be harmful to discipline, in that it would materially tend toward the obliteration of the line which is rightfully drawn between the many officers whose conduct is uniformly consonant with the accepted standards of the service and the few whose conduct is not."

The officer has been treated with exceptional clemency already. The bill proposes to put him above the heads of better officers who have never been guilty of the conduct for which he has suffered what is really only a slight punishment.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 8, 1909.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill, with the President's message, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

RADIO-TELEGRAPHY ON PASSENGER STEAMERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President (S. Doc. No. 700), which was read, referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Your attention is invited to recent events which have conclusively demonstrated the great value of radio-telegraphy, popularly known as "wireless" telegraphy, as an instrumentality for the preservation of life at sea.

While the honor of the first practical application of the scientific principles involved may belong to another country, it is gratifying to know that our inventors have been quick to seize upon and develop the idea, and that several systems of approved scientific merit and commercial practicability have been put into operation in the United States.

Furthermore, through the liberality of Congress and the intelligence and industry of the Navy Department our Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts are equipped with a chain of shore stations, designed primarily for the national defense, but capable of receiving and transmitting messages by any of the systems of wireless telegraphy now in general use. Even our distant insular territories and Alaska are so equipped.

So far as our own country is concerned, steps have thus been taken effectually to prevent the establishment of a monopoly in the practical use of the new applied art.

I deem it highly desirable that the Congress before adjournment should enact a law, requiring within reasonable limitations, as determined by what the Government of the United States has already done and by what prudent and progressive shipowners have already found practicable, that all ocean-going steamships, carrying considerable numbers of passengers on routes where wireless installations would be useful, should be required to carry efficient radio-telegraphic installations and competent operators. The subject is now under consideration by the Congress, and I am advised that legislation to effect the same general purpose is also under consideration abroad.

Our interest in its enactment is keen on account of the great number of steerage, as well as cabin, passengers who annually arrive at and depart from our ports. What we have already done along practical business lines warrants the United States in being first among nations to enact a statute requiring the use of this safeguard of human life.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 8, 1909.

Senate concurrent resolution 13.

Whereas the pioneers of Kansas withstood the onslaught of the slave power for six years before the war of the rebellion, and when that conflict came on put more soldiers in the Volunteer Army to uphold the Government than there were voters in the State, and then organized all the men left in her boundaries into the militia service to protect as best they could the homes of the absent soldiers; and

Whereas this militia organization did valiant and valuable service, being at various times called upon by the Federal Government to assist in repelling invasion, always responding with alacrity; and

Whereas we believe the survivors of the Kansas Militia from 1861 to 1865 deserve to be recognized by making them eligible to all the pension laws applicable to the volunteer soldiers of the war from 1861 to 1865: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That we most heartily commend Hon. CHARLES CURTIS and Hon. D. R. ANTHONY for introducing in the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives, respectively, bills providing for placing the patriotic survivors of our old militia veterans on the pension rolls, and that we most respectfully and earnestly request our entire delegation in Congress to unite in a strong effort to secure the passage of one of these bills at as early a date as possible, while there yet remains some to be benefited thereby.

Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of these resolutions be forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

LAWTON, OKLA., February 3, 1909.

To the honorable Congress of the United States of America,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the colored citizens of the State of Oklahoma, believe the time has come and conditions fully warrant our migration to a country where we can enjoy fully and exclusively the privilege and blessings of self-government, thereby removing all racial friction and other grievous conditions.

A large per cent of our race desire to migrate to Liberia, Africa, but on account of poverty, so common among us, are unable to do so.

Therefore we, the undersigned citizens, as delegates, ask the United States Government to grant to each member of our race who are citizens of the United States and who desire to go free transportation to Liberia, Africa.

We do not favor a compulsory law relative to said proposed removal, but an optional measure.

And in the name of the Lord we further ask our distinguished Representatives to consider our condition and help us in our humble effort, for the conditions among us are very grave and grievous, even with the best element of our race.

God grant that your decision be right and just.

IMPROVEMENT OF CHEBOYGAN RIVER, MICHIGAN.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred Senate concurrent resolution 88, submitted by Mr. SMITH of Michigan on the 5th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary survey to be made of Cheboygan River, Cheboygan County, Mich., for the purpose of widening its channel and rebuilding or repairing the locks in said river as will render the river navigable to boats drawing 8 feet of water, and to furnish an estimate of the cost of such improvement.

IMPROVEMENT OF NEW RIVER HARBOR, FLORIDA.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred Senate concurrent resolution 89, submitted by Mr. MILTON on the 8th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made an examination and survey with the view of establishing a harbor at New River, Fla., where same has been connected to the Atlantic Ocean by cut-off, and to report, together with estimate of the cost of the project, securing over the bar at that location at least 20 feet of water and the construction of jetties to project same.

SECURITY OF LIFE AT SEA.

Mr. FRYE. I see by the RECORD, Mr. President, that the Vice-President laid before the Senate the message of the President, Document No. 701, "which was read and, on motion of Mr. ALDRICH, was, with the accompanying papers, ordered to lie on the table and be printed," and I do not see any further action taken in relation to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That was the last action taken with reference to the message.

Mr. FRYE. Is it on the table now?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is on the table now, and printed.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ALDRICH. My object in having the message laid upon the table was that I might have a chance to read the accompanying report and find out something about the nature of the commission that was referred to.

Mr. FRYE. It is an official commission. All of them are officers of the Government on detail.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to the reference, but I was desirous of reading the report before the message was referred.

Mr. FRYE. I want to have it referred, so that it may be before the committee next Thursday.

Mr. ALDRICH. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. FRYE. Shall it be referred, then, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the message and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

TARIFF STATISTICS.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred Senate resolution 275, submitted by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] on the 3d instant, to report a substitute therefor. I desire to call the attention of the junior Senator from Iowa to the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed substitute will be read.

The SECRETARY. The committee report to strike out all after the word "Resolved" and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate as soon as practicable:

First. The aggregate value and amount of duties collected upon imports during the last fiscal year upon articles or merchandise upon which specific duties only were imposed.

Second. The aggregate value and amount of duties collected upon imports during the same period upon articles or merchandise upon which ad valorem duties were imposed.

Third. The aggregate value and amount of duties collected upon articles or merchandise imported upon which compound duties were imposed.

Fourth. The expense of administering the law at the various ports of entry during the same period, not including any part of the expense of the office of the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington, and especially the expense of the appraisers' offices at the various ports.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution just read.

Mr. CULBERSON. Before consent is given, I should like to have the Senator point out briefly the difference between the resolution introduced by himself and the one reported in lieu of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no substantial difference. I asked for the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the point how much less it would cost to administer our tariff if all the duties were specific than if part specific and part ad valorem. That part of the resolution is omitted by the Finance Committee. It being a mere conjecture, I am quite willing to accept the judgment of the Finance Committee upon that point.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported as a substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, to whom was referred the bill (S. 8407) to amend an act to provide for the construction of the canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, return the same to the Senate with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The amendment proposed by this bill increases the limit of cost of the construction of the Panama Canal to the sum of $500,000,000, and authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds in that amount for the purpose of meeting the expenditures of construction.

The act of June 28, 1902, known as the "Spooner Act," appropriated for the purchase of canal rights, $40,000,000; for the purchase of Canal Zone rights, $10,000,000; for the construction of the canal, $10,000,000.

Section 5 of that act authorized the President to cause the canal to be constructed, and provided that appropriations therefor should, from time to time, be hereafter made—

Not to exceed in the aggregate the additional sum of $135,000,000.

The Congress has appropriated to date for all canal purposes the following sums:

Purchase of canal rights, June 28, 1902		$40,000,000.00

And all that amount presumably will have been expended by the end of the current fiscal year.

Reducing this amount by $50,000,000, $40,000,000 for canal rights, plus $10,000,000 for Canal Zone rights, the sum of $120,964,468.58 has been appropriated for construction purposes, leaving the sum of $14,035,531.42 authorized by law to be appropriated for canal purposes.

In their report to the President and to the Congress, the minority of the board of consulting engineers pledged their professional reputations that if the lock type of canal were adopted the aggregate cost of completing the canal, exclusive of sanitation and expenses of zone government, would not exceed $139,705,200, and in statements made to your committee at hearings held during the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress they guaranteed the accuracy of their estimates.

Scarcely three years have passed since they made that report, and those statements and the great dams and locks for the type of canal adopted are not yet begun, and that feature of the work is still in a state of preparation.

The Congress has not in its possession estimates of the present Isthmian Canal Commission relative to the cost of the canal now building, although in January, 1908, before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, the chairman of that commission stated that the cost would be not less than $250,000,000, and in answer to an inquiry he stated that he was not prepared to assure the committee and the Congress that the cost would be less than $300,000,000. The report is current and the prophecy is made that when the canal commission submits to the Congress its revised estimate of the aggregate cost of construction of the lock type of canal not less than $325,000,000 will be named. Reports in the public press within the past few days convey the information that it is now proposed to build a breakwater in the harbor of Colon at an estimated cost of $10,000,000, and from a like source it is learned that it is now proposed to increase the minimum width of the canal at an excess cost of $14,000,000. If this be true, the latest estimated cost of the lock type of canal, including the purchase price of the canal rights and of the Canal Zone rights—$50,000,000—will bring the present estimated cost to $400,000,000, more than $200,000,000 in excess of the sum originally estimated and more than $100,000,000 in excess of the conceded maximum cost of the sea-level canal.

Your committee deems it unwise to authorize the enactment of law increasing the limit of cost to $500,000,000, as is proposed by the bill under consideration.

It will, no doubt, be necessary for the Congress at this session to appropriate twenty-five or thirty millions of dollars, or at least eleven millions more than is authorized by existing law. It is believed, however, that an appropriation by the Congress in excess of the amount originally authorized would be an authorization to increase the limit of cost. If in error in this suggestion, the employment of appropriate words in the appropriation bill will surely be effectual for that purpose.

Section 8 of the Spooner Act authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds for the purpose of meeting canal expenditures in the sum of $130,000,000. This section of the law was offered as an amendment to the bill, when pending on the floor of the Senate, by the Vice-President, then a Senator from the State of Indiana. It was referred to the Committee on Finance, reported favorably to the Senate, and incorporated in the act.

Under the provisions of section 8 there have been issued bonds: July, 1906, $30,000,000; November, 1907, $24,631,980; November, 1908, $30,000,000; total, $84,631,980.

In the opinion of your committee, the $10,000,000 appropriated by the Spooner Act is not reimbursable from the proceeds of the sale of bonds. It is also the opinion of your committee that the Treasury is reimbursable from the proceeds of the sale of bonds to the amount of $110,964,458.58, or the further issue of bonds in the amount of $26,332,488.58, authorized by existing law.

It is clear that if the Secretary of the Treasury issues bonds in the last-named sum prior to the end of the current fiscal year and no provision for the further issue of bonds for canal purposes is authorized, a large amount of the appropriation doubtless to be made by this Congress for the coming fiscal year must be paid from the general fund.

Your committee does not favor authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds in the sum of $500,000,000, as proposed by the bill herewith returned to the Senate. It is therefore suggested by your committee that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized, in appropriate terms to be incorporated in the current appropriation bill, to issue bonds to cover the amount to be appropriated in excess of the sum now authorized by law, or that legislation be had in general terms which will authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to cover the appropriation which Congress from time to time may make.

Under the rules of the Senate, as understood by this committee, the Finance Committee has exclusive jurisdiction in this body over the subject-matter, and for these reasons the bill is returned to the Senate with the recommendations as stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota reports from the Committee on Interoceanic Canals Senate bill 8407 and asks that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to ask the Senator from South Dakota what the estimated amount of expenditures for the coming fiscal year will be for canal construction.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, judging the future by the past, it will be between twenty-five and thirty million dollars.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to ask the Senator one or two questions. I was absent from the Chamber necessarily, and heard but a part of the Senator's remarks.

I wish to ask him whether he has stated in his remarks what the estimated cost of the canal will be, constructing it as a lock-level type of canal, according to the plans and specifications which have been adopted?

Mr. KITTREDGE. That point, Mr. President, is covered in the report. The statement is made that from the latest estimates the sum will be $400,000,000.

Mr. FORAKER. There is one other question I will ask the Senator. What was the estimated cost of a sea-level canal, as presented to the Senate at the time when we voted to adopt the lock-level canal?

Mr. KITTREDGE. The sum was $247,000,000, exclusive of the $40,000,000 paid to the French company for the property secured, plus $10,000,000 paid to Panama for Canal Zone rights.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one other question? Has anything developed since we adopted the lock-level type of canal to cause the Senator to believe that the estimate for a sea-level canal of $247,000,000 was less than it would have cost us to build a sea-level canal?

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, in my judgment the experience upon the Isthmus has demonstrated that instead of a sea-level canal costing $247,000,000 it would be less than that amount. The sea-level canal is a digging proposition pure and simple, and the experience had at Panama in the matter of excavation has been most successful. They have excavated and are excavating large amounts of material at an unexpectedly small cost per cubic yard.

Mr. FORAKER. So, if I understand the Senator—so far as we were influenced to adopt the lock-level canal in preference to a sea-level canal on grounds of economy—we made a very grave mistake.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, as stated in the report submitted, instead of the lock type of canal costing, as claimed by the lock-type engineers, $100,000,000 less than the construction of a sea-level canal, the lock type of canal under present estimates will cost $100,000,000 more.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to ask another question in this connection. Have we so far progressed in the work of constructing a lock-level canal that we could not at this time turn to a sea-level canal?

Mr. KITTREDGE. By no means. It is possible to turn from the lock-type canal to a sea level and not at great expense. In preparing for the work of the lock type you begin upon one basis, and in the construction of a sea-level type of canal you begin upon a different basis. It is largely in the work of preparation. The material actually excavated in the construction of a lock type is removed if the sea-level type is adopted, as will inevitably happen in the course of a little time.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator state what the estimated cost was at the time we adopted the lock-level type of canal which we propose to build?

Mr. KITTREDGE. That estimate was given at the sum of $139,700,000, exclusive of the cost of sanitation and the civil government of the zone.

Mr. FORAKER. The sanitation and civil government would cost no more with a sea-level canal than with a lock-level canal, I suppose?

Mr. KITTREDGE. The Senator from Ohio is entirely correct.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator from Ohio is through——

Mr. FORAKER. I thought I had the floor in my own right.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. You have the floor.

Mr. FORAKER. And I am asking the Senator from South Dakota some questions as to the report he submitted.

I wish to say in this connection, and I shall hold the floor but a moment, that I was chiefly influenced to change my support of a Nicaragua canal to the Panama Canal, in the first place, because I supposed we could build a sea-level canal at Panama and we could not build a sea-level canal at Nicaragua. I had no thought, and I do not know that anybody else had any thought, at that time, that if we went to Panama we would build anything but a sea-level canal. I advocated that at all times and under all circumstances, until it was presented to us as an economic proposition, among other things, why we should adopt the lock-level in preference to a sea-level canal; and because those who were in charge of the canal at that time, who had responsibility for a judgment and an opinion upon it, insisted to us that we should accept the lock-level in preference to the sea-level canal.

I said in the Senate when I cast my vote for a lock canal instead of a sea-level canal that I did it with doubt; that I did it with hesitation, but that I did it because those who were charged with immediate responsibility had so recommended. I surrendered my judgment, in other words, under protest, and the RECORD will show that. Everything that has occurred in connection with the canal from that moment until this has caused me to distrust the wisdom of that vote. I regret it to-day, and I believe every Senator who voted as I did will more and more regret it as results are demonstrated and established.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to ask the Senator if the change was not made from a sea-level to a lock canal because conditions existing on the Pacific Ocean and the condition of the Chagres River made it impossible to build and maintain a sea-level canal?

Mr. FORAKER. I said that economy was one ground. There were other grounds, of course. The grounds mentioned by the Senator were among the other grounds. There were even additional grounds beyond those he has added to the one I mentioned. But on the point suggested by the Senator there was a difference of opinion among the engineers. Engineers as capable as there are in this country or in the world were of opinion that those difficulties could be overcome. Whether they could be or not, I do not know. Engineers would have to settle that.

The point I make is that so far as economy is concerned there appears to have been a grave mistake made. There may not have been a mistake made, but it is my opinion that there was a mistake made. I believe all these difficulties could have been overcome.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to ask the Senator from South Dakota a question which I rose a moment ago to ask. What is the difference between the tides at the two entrances to the canal, one on the Pacific and the other on the Gulf? That is the question I suppose the Senator from Kansas had in mind.

Mr. CURTIS. The tide on the Atlantic side is from 1 to 4 feet. The tide on the Pacific side is from 19 to 24 feet.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, I wish to ask the Senator——

Mr. KITTREDGE. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly, with the permission of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. KITTREDGE. The Senator from Kansas has inadvertently misstated the fact. As a matter of fact, the tides on the Pacific are usually 10 or 12 feet. They sometimes reach the point he has stated, but it has been demonstrated by an engineer from Holland that those tides would not at all interfere with navigation, even at high tide; and from the standpoint of sanitation, the high tide on the Pacific would be a benefit.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator a question here, and then I am through? The Senator says that the ordinary——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. By permission of the Senator from Ohio I will say that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] says that the ordinary tide on the Pacific side is about 12 feet. What is the ordinary tide at Colon?

Mr. KITTREDGE. From 2 to 4 feet.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. On the Gulf side?

Mr. KITTREDGE. Yes; from 2 to 4 feet.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So that there is a difference of about 10 feet in the tides. Now, what is the distance between the two points?

Mr. KITTREDGE. About 47 miles.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That seems to cover the ground.

Mr. FORAKER. The only answer I care to make to the questions propounded by the Senator from Indiana is that that is an engineering problem, and I would not know how to solve it, but the engineers who advocated a sea-level canal gave their solution of the problem, and by reading their reports the Senator will find every difficulty which he suggests on account of the difference of the tides answered by them.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask the Senator from Ohio, with his permission——

Mr. KITTREDGE. I think the Senator from Ohio is right.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I suppose that every Senator and everybody else will agree with the Senator from Ohio that a sea-level canal would be preferable if it were practicable, but with tides only some 40 miles apart, differing at the minimum statement at least 10 feet and at the general statement, made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], 17 feet, to the mind not instructed in engineering it looks as though it is a very serious, if not an unovercomeable, difficulty.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, Mr. President, I have no doubt it does to the man who has never read the reports of the engineers on that point, but I have read the reports on that point, and they were perfectly satisfactory. Those engineers are eminent in the engineering world.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How did they propose, then——

Mr. FORAKER. I am not going into a discussion of it, and I could not now if I wanted to do so, because I read those reports at the time we disposed of this matter two years ago and I have not seen them since; but I will say to the Senator that if he has any difficulty in his mind upon that point he can go and consult those reports.

I did not rise to discuss this matter. I simply wanted to say, in answer to the figures given us by the chairman of the committee, that I have always regretted my vote, because I do not believe there is a thing in the objection urged against the sea-level canal that the engineers have not satisfactorily answered.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator refers to this being a formidable thing to one not having read the engineers' reports——

Mr. FORAKER. Well, it was to me; that is all.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course, and it is to anyone; but the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] has not only read the reports, as the Senator from Ohio has, but he has mastered this question and the whole subject, and therefore can answer clearly this simple question: How did the engineers propose to control a daily tide 19 feet high?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, answering in a word, with a tidal gate which they describe and provide for in the plan which they on their reputations as engineers told us would answer completely the difficulty suggested.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Ohio has answered that question so far as the tides are concerned. Now, either he or the Senator from South Dakota will instantly, of course, answer this: What is the force of an ocean tide rising 19 feet, and therefore how much resistance would be required to overcome it? It looks to the uninstructed mind pretty serious.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago and as the Senator suggested, to one who has not read any report from an engineer, this difference in the tides might seem to be a very serious difficulty, but, as I say, when I read their reports—while I can not recite them, except in a general way at this late date since I read them—they entirely satisfied my mind that there was no difficulty there that they did not provide for and did not overcome.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then we ought to have a sea-level canal.

Mr. FORAKER. Instead of taking his information from a Senator who is not an expert and does not profess to be, I suggest that the Senator from Indiana read the report of the engineers——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have tried to.

Mr. FORAKER. Such engineers as William Barclay Parsons, who is known all over the world not only as a capable engineer, but as a man of high character, a man whose word is as good as a bond anywhere; and, as the Senator from New Hampshire suggests to me, the majority of the engineers recommended a sea-level canal.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish merely to say in conclusion that if anybody in or out of the Senate was convinced of the practicability of a sea-level canal, it would seem to follow that is what ought to be adopted as the type of canal now or at any other time

Mr. TELLER and Mr. CURTIS addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KITTREDGE. In a moment, if the Senator from Colorado will permit me to make a brief statement.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask a question.

Mr. KITTREDGE. Mr. President, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] regarding the engineering feature necessary by reason of the tides, it was proposed that tidal locks should be established near the Pacific coast. In the judgment of the board of consulting engineers, that was a safe course to take. All the engineers did not deem the tidal locks to be necessary, but assented to them out of excess of caution. Even if the tidal locks were necessary, the gates would stand wide open half the time each day, and through those gates, at that stage of water, all the ships that would ever pass through that canal in a hundred years could travel without difficulty. In the opinion of many of the engineers constituting that consulting board, a tidal lock was not necessary at all, and a moment ago, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] will remember, a citation was given to a recent publication by a most learned engineer, a citizen of Holland, who demonstrates with mathematical accuracy that tidal locks were absolutely unnecessary. Further, the examinations that have been made from the time we took possession of the Canal Zone, May 4, 1904, with reference to that tide coming in, as it has done naturally from that day to this, have demonstrated that that tide would not at all interfere with the traffic even if the lock gates on the Pacific side were eliminated. Now I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate long on this question, but it is a question which has been before this body for the last twenty years. I have had more or less connection with it; I have some interest in it; and

I am on record in favor of a sea-level canal. I am on record in opposition to a lock canal. For many years the proposition was not urged by the American Government to build a canal through the Panama region, but through the Nicaragua route. On one or two occasions I voted against the proposition. I did not believe that it was a feasible operating scheme. I know now better than I did then that it was not.

When the proposition came here to buy the Panama Canal I made some remarks on it, and gave as my reason for voting for that scheme that we could make a sea-level canal and that no other canal would serve the business of the world.

Mr. President, I do not think that anybody in this Senate believed at the time we agreed to purchase the canal from the French Government that there would be anything done by this Government except to build a sea-level canal. Many years ago, before the French Government began work on the Panama Canal, there was a congress of engineers held in the city of Paris. Every government in the civilized world had its representatives there. So far as the American engineers were concerned, the representatives of this country were largely in the minority. The question was discussed from the standpoint, first, as to the expense, and next, as to the difference in the elevation of water during high tide. I have never heard, Mr. President, in the twenty-odd years the subject has been discussed the tide put as high as the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] has put it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. TELLER. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Colorado that I visited Panama a couple of years ago and was then told by an engineer who had been there for fourteen years that the average tide on the Atlantic side was from 1 to 4 feet, and on the Pacific side from 19 to 24 feet.

I might add here that if the Senator from Colorado is depending upon reports made by the French engineers, if he would visit Panama and see the kind of work done by them there, he would not rely very much on the reports made by them, because the material and machinery they used clearly show to any man that they did not know the extent of the work they had on hand, nor did they know the formation of the country.

Mr. TELLER. Well, Mr. President, they did not, but I want to say that they knew just as much about it as our people have known about it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield further?

Mr. TELLER. I decline to yield. I do not want to make a speech.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado declines to yield.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, as to the height of water at each end of the canal, for four hundred years it has been a question of controversy as to how it could be controlled, and I think we know just as well, without going there, as anybody can know that there has never been a tide of 19 feet on the Pacific coast.

Mr. President, I was saying that at the congress of engineers in Paris, all of the engineers, except those from America, decided in favor of a sea-level canal, and that that was the only canal that ought to be constructed. Our engineers based their position solely and entirely upon the question of cost, that a lock canal could be built for much less, either over the Nicaragua route or some other, and save a vast amount of money. It was not until there was an effort made to get a lock canal, after the purchase of the French interests, that any American engineer ever suggested that there was an advantage to the using public in a lock canal over a sea-level canal. To the astonishment of everybody, the gentleman in charge of the canal, an engineer, came before the Isthmian Canal Committee, of which my friend from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] is chairman, and stated that he would prefer a lock canal to a sea-level canal, even if the cost were the same. That was a most astonishing statement. He severed his connection with the canal very soon after that, and undoubtedly for the benefit of the canal.

Mr. President, I want to say that the engineers of this country have settled the proposition of handling water without a lock canal. There has been a great deal written on the subject, particularly during the last two years, since it has become apparent to almost everybody that a lock canal was likely to be a failure. There is not any trouble at all to control that tide.

But I am not going into any extended explanation. I have probably given as much attention to the Isthmian Canal question as any man in the Senate. I have studied all the plans, and have done so because I have a natural love for such things. I have studied them as a matter of interest to a profession of which I am not a member, but of which I have some knowledge.

I have said again and again in the Senate that we have not any fair estimate or any certain knowledge as to what the canal will cost. There is not an engineer in the world who has ever had the data and made from it an estimate that I regard as absolutely correct. I believe to-day, as the chairman of the committee has stated, that you can build a sea-level canal cheaper than you can build a lock canal, and you would then have a canal, Mr. President, which, when completed, would be of some value to the world and not be in danger at all times of being destroyed by some accident such as always may happen in the case of a lock canal.

I understand the President-elect says the present plan of a lock canal which the engineers have adopted is all right. How much a man can know of that question in a week's examination I leave to the intelligence of this body to determine. I do not believe the most expert engineer in the country could tell in a week which type of canal would be the best from the standpoint of economy. I have never contended that a sea-level canal would be as cheap as a lock canal; but I have contended that it would be much better when we secured it.

Let me say a word or two about the great dam to be built at Gatun. We were told in the beginning that the engineers would find a foundation upon which they could build a safe dam. The French Government declared they had found such a foundation; our own engineers declared they had found it. It turned out that they had struck some floating pieces of rock in the mud, and when they had gone down 287 feet they found the same condition practically that they found in the first 50 feet. The place where it is proposed to construct this dirt dam, which will be about half a mile wide and 135 feet high, is a great swamp. No such dam has ever been built in the history of the world, and the engineers of the world, with few exceptions, have declared that it can not be built. I have no doubt that, upon a safe foundation, you could build a dam that would hold the water and prevent its breaking away the dam; but the dam at Gatun is to be built upon a foundation of doubtful safety, and there is not an engineer in the country who does not know that it is doubtful. That is the opinion of those who know best; and by that I mean engineers who have given this question their serious thought. They have measured the water that falls on the watershed; they have measured, as nearly as human effort can, the evaporation, and we know that the Chagres River does not carry more than one-half the water that falls on that watershed, even after deducting evaporation. What becomes of it? It seeps under the ground through this great swamp, that is probably from 300 to 500 feet deep, and some day the pressure of that water from the swamp will make what engineers call "live water;" that is, it will percolate through until there is a stream that runs under the dam, which will carry it away.

But, Mr. President, there are more objections to a lock canal than the one regarding the dam. The real trouble is with the locks. There are to be six locks built in pairs. There is no one who yet knows what will be the foundation for those locks. The engineers of the country do not agree. One class says that there is a good foundation for them and another class declares there is not. When these six locks are built the canal will have to take the risk of accident that every lock canal in the world has taken; and I will venture to say there is not a lock canal in the world that has run five years which has not had trouble with its locks. Even in the level countries of Europe, where canal locks are not to exceed from 15 to 18 feet in height—whereas the locks in the proposed Panama Canal are to be from 28 or 29 feet—accidents have occurred in which the locks have been destroyed. If a ship moving through the locks, by any inadvertence, moves too fast or moves backward, it may tear a lock out. If that happens in the case of other canals, it would be likely to happen on the Isthmus, for the locks are all to be built of concrete.

Nobody knows how much the locks are going to cost. Why? Because there have been no such locks constructed in this country or elsewhere in the world, and engineers do not agree as to what they will cost. We started out with the estimate of about $37,000,000 for the construction of the locks. They have gone up, and now there is no estimate for the locks of less than $67,000,000, or nearly twice what was originally proposed; and there must be three locks on the Atlantic side and three on the Pacific side.

Mr. President, I do not want to go over the discussion we have had on this matter. I have said again and again on this floor—and I repeat it now—that if we get the canal built for $500,000,000, whether a lock or a sea-level canal, we shall do very well. In my judgment, we will never get that canal, in either form, except at a cost of more than $500,000,000.

But there is something besides the question of the cost of building the canal. We have taken possession of the Isthmus of Panama. When De Lesseps failed we notified the French Government that a French corporation could go on and build the canal, but we notified them diplomatically that the French Government could not build the canal; that individuals or a corporation might build it, but that no nation in the world but ours should build that canal.

We owe something to the commerce of the world. We owe to the commerce of the world the building of an adequate canal, a canal capable of doing the work for which it is intended—the bringing together of the two great oceans, the Atlantic and the Pacific.

The Senate committee took a large amount of testimony, and the chairman, I think, will bear me out in the statement I now make, that the best engineering talent in this country that came before the committee was for a sea-level canal. I think I do not misstate it when I say that every practical ship man who appeared before the committee declared in favor of a sea-level canal. The practical men were for such a canal, because they did not believe that a lock canal would do the work in a satisfactory manner.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not desire to ask the Senator any question. I want to be recognized in my own right.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I ask what question is before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order is "Reports of committees." The debate has been proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to further debate then, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire asks for the regular order.

Mr. TELLER. What is the regular order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are in order. Are there further reports of committees?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, in my experience in the Senate of now nearly thirty years—a few days within thirty years—this is the first time I have ever been taken off the floor in such a manner.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. TELLER. No, sir; I had not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care to proceed if the Senator wants to make that objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not want to make it while the Senator is on the floor, but I have some morning business to transact and duties outside of the Senate Chamber in the service of the Senate that I should like to perform this afternoon. That is all.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, one of the complaints I make is that the Senate has never discussed or considered the canal question as it ought to have been discussed and considered.

I said in the beginning of my remarks that we had not done any better than had the French. It is said that we have done most excellent work down there. I do not seek to speak disparagingly of that. We have reduced the expense of the removal of the dirt to a great extent, and the work done down on the Isthmus, sanitary and otherwise, has been most excellent; but we have never had any data by which we could determine what the canal would eventually cost. We have gone at it in the dark. We have practically instructed the President of the United States to build such a canal as he shall see fit. I believe the Senate and the House together determined that they wanted a lock canal. The President-elect went down to Panama the other day. He found that the great cut about which we have been talking, where the locks are to be, was not in the condition that it ought to be in, and so he ordered the widening of the cut, making it one-third wider than it would be under the present plan. We are told that the estimate for the widening is $14,000,000.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. Does the Senator mean to inform the Senate that a private citizen ordered the canal made so much wider or deeper?

Mr. TELLER. I do not suppose he actually ordered it.

Mr. MONEY. I did not understand the Senator, then.

Mr. TELLER. I think I did say that he ordered it. I probably should have said that he determined, at least, that the Culebra cut ought to be 100 feet wider, and the newspapers stated that, upon his suggestion, it was to be made 100 feet wider. I suppose the present Chief Executive would, perhaps, settle that under the suggestion of the incoming President. I do not intend, however, to find any fault with that. It has been one of the complaints I have been making for years that the cut was too narrow, and experience has shown it to be too narrow. The cut has been caving and sliding in for many months, and that has seriously impeded the work on the canal. I only mention this to show that, with the vast amount of money we have expended, we are all still at sea as to what the canal is going to cost. I have no doubt that the estimate made by the chairman of the committee is entirely too small. I fear the canal can not be built for the amount he named. I believe, though, Mr. President, that a sea-level canal can be built that will not cost more than the proposed lock canal. I do not know that it will be any cheaper to build, but I believe, in the end, you would find that it would be a good deal cheaper to have a sea-level canal than a lock canal.

Now, I apologize to the Senate for taking its time on this subject; but I believe if we should take two or three days in the discussion and consideration of this question we would return to the idea we had when we bought out the French and build a sea-level canal, the only canal, in my judgment, which will ever be useful or profitable, either to the people who build it or to those who use it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. I rise to the report submitted by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. I inquire if the report has been disposed of?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report has been referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I have some doubt about whether the bill ought to be referred to the Finance Committee or ought to be retained by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. I have the honor to be a member of the latter committee, but I was unfortunately prevented from attending the meeting at which this conclusion was reached. I should be glad, if it is possible in the present status of the matter, that the question of reference lie on the table until it can be somewhat further considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will regard it as an open question and the report as before the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. In view of what I see is the disposition of the Senate, I do not mean that it shall be considered further now, but that it may lie on the table until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understood the request of the Senator from Texas. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WARREN. Before the matter is dismissed I wish to ask two brief questions of the chairman of the committee.

I do not care to discuss the merits or the demerits of either a sea-level or a lock-level canal, nor whether or not we ought to have undertaken to build the canal. It is sufficient for the present to know that we are actually and rapidly building it; but I desire to ask two questions. First, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] in his remarks stated that with a sea-level canal the question is purely one of digging, and later on in discussing the matter of possible locks or gates for a sea-level canal he gave it as his opinion that neither would be necessary.

I wish to inquire whether, in the amount he gave as the sum total of the cost of a sea-level canal, an allowance was made for the building of such locks or gates as some of the engineers had proposed and asserted were necessary, or has he taken the digging of the canal alone, on the supposition that it could be handled without either locks or gates?

Mr. KITTREDGE. The estimated cost of the lock-gates on the Pacific side was included in the estimate stated as the aggregate cost of the construction of a sea-level canal.

Mr. WARREN. I think we needed that to complete the statement of the Senator. I want to ask one other question. If I understand the matter correctly, in the amount of money expended on the canal for its purchase and building we shall exceed the bonded limit by some $20,000,000 or more by the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. KITTREDGE. There will be left about $20,000,000 of bonds possible to be issued to cover or meet appropriations that this Congress may make.

There has been, as stated in the report of the committee, to date issued in round numbers—I have not more accurate data at hand—bonds in the sum of $84,000,000. There has been appropriated for canal construction purposes in round numbers the sum of $110,000,000. The difference between $110,000,000 and $84,000,000 is, in the judgment of the committee, reimbursable prior to the end of the current fiscal year by the issue of bonds on the part of this Government. If that be done and the appropriation at this Congress for the coming fiscal year is $30,000,000, for example, there is authority to issue bonds to the amount of $20,000,000 of that $30,000,000, leaving uncovered by the issue of bonds in round numbers $10,000,000, and unless provision is made at this Congress to cover such excess the payment must be made from the general funds.

Mr. WARREN. Now, I will put it in another way. Suppose we are to bond for every dollar that we have expended or may expend on the canal for any and all purposes, where would the balance be, if we should strike it to-day, as between the total amount which has been appropriated for all purposes and the limit of $130,000,000, I believe it is, for which we are permitted to issue bonds?

Mr. KITTREDGE. Sixty million dollars, the amount appropriated in the Spooner Act, $40,000,000 of that sum going to the payment of the French company for their property.

Mr. WARREN. I understand that; but what I want to get at——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of Senators to the fact that the debate is proceeding out of order. The regular order has been demanded by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. WARREN. I am aware of that, and I am simply asking consent to proceed. Of course, unless consent is given, I will not proceed further.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. I only want to get an answer to one question. I fear I do not quite understand the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WARREN. My idea is that for every dollar which goes into the canal, or is on canal account, we ought to issue bonds, taking nothing directly from the Treasury, except temporarily, and that we should also reimburse the Treasury for what we have already taken from it. Now, where would the balance stand to-day, taking all the money we have appropriated for all purposes connected with the canal, and deducting it from the limit as to bonds provided now in the law?

Mr. KITTREDGE. The Spooner law permits the issue of bonds in the amount of $130,000,000. We have appropriated since the passage of the Spooner Act, in round numbers, one hundred and ten or one hundred and eleven million dollars. It is permissible, in my opinion, to issue bonds to that amount, and no more, until Congress shall make further appropriations up to the limit authorized by that act.

Mr. WARREN. Does the $110,000,000 cover every expense in connection with the canal?

Mr. KITTREDGE. It does, subsequent to the $60,000,000 appropriated in the Spooner Act.

Mr. WARREN. Ah! That is what I wanted to understand. Then your purpose is to leave out the $60,000,000 drawn from the Treasury direct and not reimburse the Treasury from the proceeds of sale of bonds, and your calculation is based upon that.

Mr. KITTREDGE. That amount was paid from the general fund in the Treasury, and the language of the act provides that sums appropriated hereafter may be covered by the issue of bonds. Under existing law, in my opinion, it is not possible to reimburse the Treasury to the extent of $60,000,000, at least without legislation by Congress.

Mr. WARREN. Then we must have some legislation in order to place it upon a bonded basis?

Mr. KITTREDGE. That is correct.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now I ask for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are in order.

OSAGE TRIBE OF INDIANS.

Mr. OWEN. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 70) for the enrollment of certain persons as members of the Osage tribe of Indians, and for other purposes, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 950) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I object.

Mr. KEAN. Let it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the joint resolution will go to the calendar.

FRANCISCO KREBS.

Mr. MONEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 27252) for the relief of Francisco Krebs and his heirs and assigns. It will take but a moment. A similar bill passed both Houses, and was vetoed by the President because of objections on the part of the Light-House Board. The Light-House Board has now made all the corrections it desires; and this is its bill. It is very necessary that it should be passed at this session in order that certain improvements which are desirable may be made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has heretofore been read. Is there objection to its present consideration?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to confirm Francisco Krebs, his heirs and assigns, in his title to a certain part of Round Island, in the State of Mississippi, situated in sections 33 and 34, township 8 south, range 6 west, east of Pearl River, containing approximately 60.85 acres.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES S. BLOOD.

Mr. FULTON. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13809) for the relief of Charles S. Blood, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 945) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Florida to the bill.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may now be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEAN. What is the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KEAN. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been read. It will be read again at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. KEAN. Is there a report accompanying it?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a report accompanying it. The Secretary will again read the bill at the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

The Secretary again read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEAN. The bill seems to pay some one. I do not understand it exactly. However, I shall not object if no one else does.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Charles S. Blood, late a second lieutenant of Company A, Forty-seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, $563.65 for services as such officer from July 2, 1863, to January 31, 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF COMMISSION ON COUNTRY LIFE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States (S. Doc. No. 705); which was read, and, on motion of Mr. HEYBURN, was, with the accompanying paper, ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

SPECIAL MESSAGE.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith the report of the Commission on Country Life. At the outset I desire to point out that not a dollar of the public money has been paid to any commissioner for his work on the commission.

The report shows the general condition of farming life in the open country, and points out its larger problems; it indicates ways in which the Government, National and State, may show the people how to solve some of these problems; and it suggests a continuance of the work which the commission began.

Judging by thirty public hearings, to which farmers and farmers' wives from forty States and Territories, came, and from 120,000 answers to printed questions sent out by the Department of Agriculture, the commission finds that the general level of country life is high compared with any preceding time or with any other land. If it has in recent years slipped down in some places, it has risen in more places. Its progress has been general, if not uniform.

Yet farming does not yield either the profit or the satisfaction that it ought to yield and may be made to yield. There is discontent in the country, and in places discouragement. Farmers as a class do not magnify their calling, and the movement to the towns, though, I am happy to say, less than formerly, is still strong.

Under our system, it is helpful to promote discussion of ways in which the people can help themselves. There are three main directions in which the farmers can help themselves; namely, better farming, better business, and better living on the farm. The National Department of Agriculture, which has rendered services equaled by no other similar department in any other time or place; the state departments of agriculture; the state colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts, especially through their extension work; the state agricultural experiment stations; the Farmers' Union; the Grange; the agricultural press; and other similar agencies; have all combined to place within the reach of the American farmer an amount and quality of agricultural information which, if applied, would enable him, over large areas, to double the production of the farm.

The object of the Commission on Country Life therefore is not to help the farmer raise better crops, but to call his attention to the opportunities for better business and better living on the farm. If country life is to become what it should be, and what I believe it ultimately will be—one of the most dignified, desirable, and sought-after ways of earning a living—the farmer must take advantage not only of the agricultural knowledge which is at his disposal, but of the methods which have raised and continue to raise the standards of living and of intelligence in other callings.

Those engaged in all other industrial and commercial callings have found it necessary, under modern economic conditions, to organize themselves for mutual advantage and for the protection of their own particular interests in relation to other interests. The farmers of every progressive European country have realized this essential fact and have found in the cooperative system exactly the form of business combination they need.

Now whatever the State may do toward improving the practice of agriculture, it is not within the sphere of any government to reorganize the farmers' business or reconstruct the social life of farming communities. It is, however, quite within its power to use its influence and the machinery of publicity which it can control for calling public attention to the needs and the facts. For example, it is the obvious duty of the Government to call the attention of farmers to the growing monopolization of water power. The farmers above all should have that power, on reasonable terms, for cheap transportation, for lighting their homes, and for innumerable uses in the daily tasks on the farm.

It would be idle to assert that life on the farm occupies as good a position in dignity, desirability, and business results as the farmers might easily give it if they chose. One of the chief difficulties is the failure of country life, as it exists at present, to satisfy the higher social and intellectual aspirations of country people. Whether the constant draining away of so much of the best elements in the rural population into the towns is due chiefly to this cause or to the superior business opportunities of city life may be open to question. But no one at all familiar with farm life throughout the United States can fail to recognize the necessity for building up the life of the farm upon its social as well as upon its productive side.

It is true that country life has improved greatly in attractiveness, health, and comfort, and that the farmer's earnings are higher than they were. But city life is advancing even more rapidly, because of the greater attention which is being given by the citizens of the towns to their own betterment. For just this reason the introduction of effective agricultural cooperation throughout the United States is of the first importance. Where farmers are organized cooperatively they not only avail themselves much more readily of business opportunities and improved methods, but it is found that the organizations which bring them together in the work of their lives are used also for social and intellectual advancement.

The cooperative plan is the best plan of organization wherever men have the right spirit to carry it out. Under this plan any business undertaking is managed by a committee; every man has one vote and only one vote; and everyone gets profits according to what he sells or buys or supplies. It develops individual responsibility and has a moral as well as a financial value over any other plan.

I desire only to take counsel with the farmers as fellow-citizens. It is not the problem of the farmers alone that I am discussing with them, but a problem which affects every city as well as every farm in the country. It is a problem which the working farmers will have to solve for themselves; but it is a problem which also affects in only less degree all the rest of us, and therefore if we can render any help toward its solution, it is not only our duty but our interest to do so.

The foregoing will, I hope, make it clear why I appointed a commission to consider problems of farm life which have hitherto had far too little attention, and the neglect of which has not only held back life in the country, but also lowered the efficiency of the whole Nation. The welfare of the farmer is of vital consequence to the welfare of the whole community. The strengthening of country life, therefore, is the strengthening of the whole Nation.

The commission has tried to help the farmers to see clearly their own problem and to see it as a whole; to distinguish clearly between what the Government can do and what the farmers must do for themselves; and it wishes to bring not only the farmers but the Nation as a whole to realize that the growing of crops, though an essential part, is only a part of country life. Crop growing is the essential foundation; but it is no less essential that the farmer shall get an adequate return for what he grows; and it is no less essential—indeed it is literally vital—that he and his wife and his children shall lead the right kind of life.

For this reason, it is of the first importance that the United States Department of Agriculture, through which as prime agent the ideas the commission stands for must reach the people, should become without delay in fact a Department of Country Life, fitted to deal not only with crops, but also with all the larger aspects of life in the open country.

From all that has been done and learned three great general and immediate needs of country life stand out:

First, effective cooperation among farmers, to put them on a level with the organized interests with which they do business.

Second, a new kind of schools in the country, which shall teach the children as much outdoors as indoors and perhaps more, so that they will prepare for country life, and not as at present, mainly for life in town.

Third, better means of communication, including good roads and a parcels post, which the country people are everywhere, and rightly, unanimous in demanding.

To these may well be added better sanitation; for easily preventable diseases hold several million country people in the slavery of continuous ill health.

The commission points out, and I concur in the conclusion, that the most important help that the Government, whether National or State, can give is to show the people how to go about these tasks of organization, education, and communication with the best and quickest results. This can be done by the collection and spread of information. One community can thus be informed of what other communities have done, and one country of what other countries have done. Such help by the people's government would lead to a comprehensive plan of organization, education, and communication, and make the farming country better to live in, for intellectual and social reasons as well as for purely agricultural reasons.

The Government through the Department of Agriculture does not cultivate any man's farm for him. But it does put at his service useful knowledge that he would not otherwise get. In the same way the National and State Governments might put into the people's hands the new and right knowledge of school work. The task of maintaining and developing the schools would remain, as now, with the people themselves.

The only recommendation I submit is that an appropriation of $25,000 be provided, to enable the commission to digest the material it has collected, and to collect and to digest much more that is within its reach, and thus complete its work. This would enable the commission to gather in the harvest of suggestion which is resulting from the discussion it has stirred up. The commissioners have served without compensation, and I do not recommend any appropriation for their services, but only for the expenses that will be required to finish the task that they have begun.

To improve our system of agriculture seems to me the most urgent of the tasks which lie before us. But it can not, in my judgment, be effected by measures which touch only the material and technical side of the subject; the whole business and life of the farmer must also be taken into account. Such considerations led me to appoint the Commission on Country Life. Our object should be to help develop in the country community the great ideals of community life as well as of personal character. One of the most important adjuncts to this end must be the country church, and I invite your attention to what the commission says of the country church and of the need of an extension of such work as that of the Young Men's Christian Association in country communities. Let me lay special emphasis upon what the commission says at the very end of its report on personal ideals and local leadership. Everything resolves itself in the end into the question of personality. Neither society nor government can do much for country life unless there is voluntary response in the personal ideals of the men and women who live in the country. In the development of character, the home should be more important than the school, or than society at large. When once the basic material needs have been met, high ideals may be quite independent of income; but they can not be realized without sufficient income to provide adequate foundation; and where the community at large is not financially prosperous it is impossible to develop a high average personal and community ideal. In short, the fundamental facts of human nature apply to men and women who live in the country just as they apply to men and women who live in the towns. Given a sufficient foundation of material well-being, the influence of the farmers and farmers' wives on their children becomes the factor of first importance in determining the attitude of the next generation toward farm life. The farmer should realize that the person who most needs consideration on the farm is his wife. I do not in the least mean that she should purchase ease at the expense of duty. Neither man nor woman is really happy or really useful save on condition of doing his or her duty. If the woman shirks her duty as housewife, as home keeper, as the mother whose prime function it is to bear and rear a sufficient number of healthy children, then she is not entitled to our regard. But if she does her duty she is more entitled to our regard even than the man who does his duty; and the man should show special consideration for her needs.

I warn my countrymen that the great recent progress made in city life is not a full measure of our civilization; for our civilization rests at bottom on the wholesomeness, the attractiveness, and the completeness, as well as the prosperity, of life in the country. The men and women on the farms stand for what is fundamentally best and most needed in our American life. Upon the development of country life rests ultimately our ability, by methods of farming requiring the highest intelligence, to continue to feed and clothe the hungry nations; to supply the city with fresh blood, clean bodies, and clear brains that can endure the terrific strain of modern life; we need the development of men in the open country, who will be in the future, as in the past, the stay and strength of the Nation in time of war, and its guiding and controlling spirit in time of peace.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 9, 1909.

APPENDIX.

One of the most illuminating—and incidentally one of the most interesting and amusing—series of answers sent to the commission was from a farmer in Missouri. He stated that he had a wife and 11 living children, he and his wife being each 52 years old, and that they owned 520 acres of land without any mortgage hanging over their heads. He had himself done well, and his views as to why many of his neighbors had done less well are entitled to consideration. These views are expressed in terse and vigorous English; they can not always be quoted in full. He states that the farm homes in his neighborhood are not as good as they should be because too many of them are encumbered by mortgages; that the schools do not train boys and girls satisfactorily for life on the farm, because they allow them to get an idea in their heads that city life is better, and that to remedy this practical farming should be taught. To the question whether the farmers and their wives in his neighborhood are satisfactorily organized, he answers: "Oh, there is a little one-horse grange gang in our locality, and every darned one thinks they aught to be a king." To the question, "Are the renters of farms in your neighborhood making a satisfactory living?" he answers: "No; because they move about so much hunting a better job." To the question, "Is the supply of farm labor in your neighborhood satisfactory?" the answer is: "No; because the people have gone out of the baby business;" and when asked as to the remedy, he answers, "Give a pension to every mother who gives birth to seven living boys on American soil." To the question "Are the conditions surrounding hired labor on the farm in your neighborhood satisfactory to the hired men?" he answers: "Yes; unless he is a drunken cuss," adding that he would like to blow up the stillhouses and root out whisky and beer." To the question "Are the sanitary conditions on the farms in your neighborhood satisfactory?" he answers: "No; to careless about chicken yards (and the like) and poorly covered Wells, in one Well on neighbor's farm I counted 7 snakes in the Wall of the Well, and they used the water daily, his wife dead now and he is looking for another." He ends by stating that the most important single thing to be done for the betterment of country life is "good roads;" but in his answers he shows very clearly that most important of all is the individual equation of the man or woman.

The humor of this set of responses must not blind us to the shrewd common sense and good judgment they display. The man is a good citizen; his wife is a good citizen; and their views are fundamentally sound. Very much information of the most valuable kind can be gathered if the commission is given the money necessary to enable it to arrange and classify the information obtained from the great mass of similar answers which they have received. But there is one point where the testimony is as a whole in flat contradiction to that contained above. The general feeling is that the organizations of farmers, the grangers and the like, have been of the very highest service not only to the farmers but to the farmers' wives, and that they have conferred great social as well as great industrial advantages. An excellent little book has recently been published by Miss Jennie Buell, called "One Woman's Work for Farm Women." It is dedicated "To farm women everywhere," and is the story of Mary A. Mayo's part in rural social movements. It is worth while to read this little volume to see how much the hard-working woman who lives on the farm can do for herself when once she is given sympathy, encouragement, and occasional leadership.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 9, 1909.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BIRTHDAY OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Library be discharged from the further consideration of House joint resolution 247, and that the Senate amendment be disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Committee on the Library be discharged from the further consideration of the House joint resolution which was read yesterday, and that the House disagree to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur with the amendment of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has asked unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on the Library and disagree to the amendment of the Senate. These two requests are coupled together.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McCALL. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withhold his objection for a moment.

Mr. MADDEN. I will withhold it.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, the House resolution was reported by the Committee on Library subsequent to the message of the President recommending that the 12th of February of this year, the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, be made a legal holiday. The House passed that resolution and it went to the Senate. The Senate added an amendment, the substance of which was to provide for the survey of a road to Gettysburg. Under the rule that amendment would go to the Committee on Library, and if we reported favorably, it would have to go to the Committee of the Whole House, and it would be quite impossible during the time between now and Friday to decide the question. I am informed that for the purpose of carrying through the recommendation of the President to have Friday made a legal holiday the other branch will probably recede so that the resolution will at once go to the President. Of course, if another proposition is insisted upon it will result in defeating the main purpose of the resolution.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCALL. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to say in reply to the gentleman who makes the statement that personally I am in favor of the amendment put on by the Senate, and if unanimous consent is to be given with the end in view of striking out the Senate amendment from the resolution, I shall feel obliged to object.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I will say that that would not finally dispose of the proposition contained in the Senate amendment; but if the gentleman is in favor of a holiday on Friday, and everybody is, it gives the two Houses an opportunity to do the only thing possible between now and Friday, and that is to decide in favor of a holiday. Of course, this resolution must be passed before Friday. We can not well provide by retroactive statute to have a holiday on a day that has already passed.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCALL. For a question.

Mr. SIMS. What is the object of loading down the resolution to make this a holiday with some initiative process to do something that has not been discussed in the House or in the Senate?

Mr. McCALL. It seemed to the House, I think, and certainly to the Committee on the Library, that the proposition contained in the President's message was a simple and independent proposition for a holiday on Friday.

Mr. SIMS. And nothing else.

Mr. McCALL. And that it was no more appropriate to put on a provision relating to a highway than to put on some of the other numerous proposals for memorials of Lincoln in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman intends to yield to the Senate amendment, or any other similar amendment, or to do anything more than to pass the resolution simply for a holiday, as recommended by the President, I shall object.

Mr. McCALL. We do not ask for a conference. This gives the Senate an opportunity to recede, and I am reliably informed that it will probably do that.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not going to ask for a conference?

Mr. McCALL. I am not.

Mr. MANN. That would naturally come later?

Mr. McCALL. Yes; but it would be useless, because it would defeat the main purpose of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. I want to say to the gentleman that this day is set apart for the consideration of a special bill, and the rights of that bill expire to-day. If it is going to take an hour, or two hours, to dispose of this proposition after you get your committee discharged, I think I shall have to object.

Mr. McCALL. There will be no discussion, because we are asking unanimous consent to accomplish two things.

Mr. MANN. But my colleague says that he moves to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. McCALL. But that is not in order, because I am requesting unanimous consent for the discharge of the committee and disagreeing to the Senate amendment, that the resolution may go immediately to the Senate.

Mr. MADDEN. The easiest way to accomplish the establishment of a holiday, it seems to me, would be for the gentleman to agree to concur in the Senate amendment and adopt the resolution as amended.

Mr. MANN. That could not be done to-day by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on the Library from the further consideration of the resolution indicated, and to disagree to the Senate amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say this to the gentleman from Massachusetts: There are some of us in the House here who concur heartily in the proposition of the Senate. We think it is more important to build a road from here to Gettysburg as a memorial to Mr. Lincoln than we do to merely set apart one day as a holiday. We think the Senate amendment is the more important of the two things, and under these circumstances, and feeling that way, if the gentleman, by his unanimous consent, attempts to keep this out of conference, where there can be a full and free conference on both questions before the Senate and the House, I shall object. If he asks for a conference, I will be willing to accede.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman in his zeal for a highway can defeat the main purpose of the House proposition. Obviously, he can not arrange to have a highway built between now and Friday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly not; but the gentleman can ask to nonconcur and for a conference.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

VALDEZ, MARSHALL PASS AND NORTHERN RAILROAD.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 25823) to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the time for the completion of the Valdez, Marshall Pass and Northern Railroad, and for other purposes," approved February 21, 1907, and to consider the same in the House at this time, which bill I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to extend the time for the completion of the Valdez, Marshall Pass and Northern Railroad, and for other purposes," approved February 21, 1907, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That the time for the compliance of the Valdez, Marshall Pass and Northern Railroad Company with the provisions of sections 4 and 5 of chapter 295 of the laws of the United States, entitled 'An act extending the homestead laws and providing for the right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes,' approved May 14, 1898, by locating and completing its railroad in Alaska, is hereby extended—

"First. Said company shall have four years from the passage of this act within which to complete the first 20 miles of its railroad, by way of Keystone Canyon, Marshall Pass to Copper River, and from thence to Tanana River, and six years from the date of the passage of this act within which to complete said railroad to the Tanana River, all to be within such rights as it possesses and not in any way affecting or contravening any vested rights of any other company or person or the rights of the Government, provided said company carry out the requirements of law.

"Second. Said company shall be exempt from license tax during the period of construction and for four years thereafter: Provided, That the total period of exemption shall not exceed ten years from the time of the passage of this act: And provided further, That this exemption shall exist and operate only during the continuance of the construction of said road in good faith, and in the event of unnecessary delay and failure in the construction and completion of said road the exemption from taxation herein provided shall cease and said tax shall be collectible as to so much of said road as shall have been completed.

"Third. Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Speaker, I want to reserve the right to object so that I may know something of what is in the bill. It seems a very long bill, with a great many provisions, and it seems almost impossible that it would be right to pass it in this way.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. REEDER. I want to learn how much time this extends the provisions of this bill.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Two years ago an act was passed extending the period for three years.

Mr. REEDER. Two years ago it was extended for three years?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes; and they have but one year under that act. By reason of the stringency of the times for the past year and a half it has been impossible for these people to raise the necessary amount of money to complete this road.

Mr. REEDER. How much of the road is now completed?

Mr. REYNOLDS. There are about 18 miles of way cleared for the road. About 8 miles, as near as I can tell, have been graded, and about 2 miles laid with ties. A wharf has been built. The parties have expended between three and four hundred thousand dollars of money in the construction of the road as far as they have gone and in the construction of the wharf.

Mr. REEDER. When was this law first passed; how long have they had since they commenced?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I could not tell exactly now. This bill is intended to give them just one year longer within that time provided by the bill which was passed two years ago.

Mr. REEDER. Does it change the conditions of the law in any way?

Mr. REYNOLDS. It does not. In express terms it reserves to others whatever rights they may have. I want to assure the gentleman that from the investigations we have made no other railroad has located in that region, and it has the unanimous report of the Committee on Territories, after a very full and careful examination.

Mr. REEDER. It does not change the provisions of law at all?

Mr. REYNOLDS. It does not, with the exception that it gives one year longer.

Mr. REEDER. I have no objection.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman if this has been submitted to the Secretary of the Interior? He has reported very strongly against very many of these extensions.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Well, not in this case, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Has the Secretary of the Interior passed on it at all, recommended it, or is he opposed to it?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I do not know about this particular road. There has been no objection at any time before our committee within the last three or four years with respect to this road. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Iowa that it has been the custom of the Committee on the Territories to refer railroad bills to the Secretary of the Interior, with the request for information as to whether the proposed line conflicts in any way with any other proposed line, to ascertain how much money has been invested, and to find out as far as possible whether the company is acting in good faith. One of the crying needs of Alaska is transportation. Freight rates from the coast to inland points are practically prohibitive. They amount to six to eight dollars per ton per mile. It appeared in hearings before the committee that at a place called "Tanana Crossing," 250 miles from the Gulf of Alaska, sugar, flour, and salt were each of them 75 cents per pound, regardless of the commodity itself, depending entirely on the cost of transportation. It is therefore important that transportation shall be developed into Alaska.

Now, this railroad was projected from Valdez. Something like 18 miles have been cleared northward. It does not conflict with any other road. Six miles have been built, as I understand. They have invested between $300,000 and $400,000 in wharves, preliminary surveys, and definite locations. They are simply asking for an extension of time of one year. They say that owing to the financial stringency last year they have been hampered in getting the necessary funds to go on with this railroad, and it seemed to the committee entirely equitable to give them one year more in which to try to do something. That is about all there is to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This bill extends the time four years.

Mr. REYNOLDS. One year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Four years from the passage of this act to build the first 20 miles, and six years to complete the balance of the road. Now, how many times has the time of this company been extended?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Once.

Mr. FITZGERALD. When did they start?

Mr. REYNOLDS. They start at Valdez Bay.

Mr. FITZGERALD. When were they first authorized to commence this road?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Two years ago. This bill simply extends the time one year longer than that provided for in the bill as it passed two years ago. The projectors of this road, as I understand, have made their necessary arrangements for its completion, and expect to send a surveying party out into that region this summer, and it would take the entire summer to have the survey and report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to move an amendment to the bill by striking out, in lines 10 and 11, on page 1, the words "chapter 295 of the laws of the United States" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the act." It is a formal amendment. It means nothing the way it is now.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, that amendment is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

IMMEDIATE TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE MERCHANDISE.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the following bill and to consider the same in the House at this time. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 24140) extending the provisions of the act of June 10, 1880, concerning transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement.

Be it enacted, etc., That the privileges of the first section of the acts approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement, be, and the same are hereby, extended to the subports of Blaine and Sumas, in the State of Washington.

SEC. 2. That the deputy collectors of customs at the subports of Seattle and Tacoma, in the State of Washington, shall receive such compensation as the Secretary of the Treasury shall determine.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Strike out all of section 2.

On page 2, line 3, strike out "3" and insert "2."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman explain this bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. This is to extend the privilege of immediate transportation to Sumas and Blaine, which are ports on the northern border. That is all. The other section is stricken out.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

COLORADO DESERT LANDS.

Mr. HAGGOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 19606.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado moves to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill named and that the same be considered at this time. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19606) to provide for the granting and patenting to the State of Colorado desert lands within the former Ute Indian Reservation in said State.

Be it enacted, etc., That the provision of section 4 of "An act making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes," approved August 18, 1894, and the amendments thereof, approved June 11, 1896, and March 3, 1901, respectively, be, and are hereby, extended over and shall apply to the desert lands within the limits of all of that portion of the former Ute Indian Reservation, in the State of Colorado, described and embraced in the act entitled "An act relating to lands in Colorado lately occupied by the Umcompahgre and White River Ute Indians," approved July 28, 1882: Provided, That before a patent shall issue for any of the lands aforesaid under the terms of the act approved August 18, 1894, and amendments thereto, the State of Colorado shall pay into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $1.25 per acre for the lands so patented, and the money so paid shall be subject to the provisions of section 3 of the act of June 15, 1880, entitled "An act to accept the agreements submitted by the confederated bands of Ute Indians in Colorado for the sale of their reservation in said State, and to make the necessary appropriation for carrying out same."

SEC. 2. That no lands shall be included in any tract to be segregated under the provisions of this act on which the United States Government has valuable improvements or which have been reserved for any Indian schools or farm purposes.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

In line 12, page 1, after the word "Reservation," insert the words "not included in any national forest;" in line 11, page 2, after the word "accept," insert the words "and ratify;" and in line 14, page 2, after the word "State," insert "and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

SMALL HOLDINGS CLAIM.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 15442.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15442) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a court of private land claims and to provide for the settlement of private land claims in certain States and Territories," approved March 3, 1891, and the acts amendatory thereto, approved February 21, 1893, and June 27, 1898.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 18 of an act entitled "An act to establish a court of private land claims and to provide for the settlement of private land claims in certain States and Territories," approved March 3, 1891, as amended by the act approved February 21, 1893, and by the act approved June 27, 1898, be, and the same is hereby, further amended by striking out the words "before the 4th day of March, 1901," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "before the 4th day of March, 1909," so that the first clause of said section shall read as follows, namely:

"That all claims arising under either of the two next preceding sections of this act shall be filed with the surveyor-general of the proper State or Territory before the 4th day of March, 1909, and no claim not so filed shall be valid."

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Amend by striking out the word "nine" in lines 3 and 8 on page 2 and substituting therefor the word "ten."

Further amend by adding thereto, after line 9, page 2, the following:

"Provided, That the extension herein granted shall not apply to lands within the limits of a confirmed grant or embraced in any entry completed under the public-land laws prior to filing of a claim hereunder, nor shall its provision extend to persons holding under assignments made after March 3, 1901."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BOYD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR HENDERSON, KY.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union may be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 27069) to authorize the Secretary of War to donate two condemned brass or bronze cannon or fieldpieces and cannon balls to the city of Henderson, Ky., and that the same be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 27069) to authorize the Secretary of War to donate two condemned brass or bronze cannon or fieldpieces and cannon balls to the city of Henderson, Ky.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to donate to the city of Henderson, Ky., two condemned brass or bronze cannon or fieldpieces with a suitable outfit of cannon balls, which may not be needed in the service, the same to be placed in Central Park, in Henderson, Ky., and for which said city is trustee: Provided, That the articles of ordnance property furnished under the provisions of this act shall not be required to be accounted for by the Chief of Ordnance, and no expense shall be incurred by the United States in the delivery of the same.

Also the following committee amendment:

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STANLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid upon the table.

BUILDING ASSOCIATIONS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6055) to amend section 691 of subchapter 7, building associations, of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 6055) to amend section 691 of subchapter 7, building associations, of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 691, subchapter 7, of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, relating to building associations, be amended so that the same shall read:

"SEC. 691. Objects.—The object of such corporation shall be the accumulation of a capital in money to be derived from the savings and accumulations by the members thereof, to be paid into said corporation in such sums and at such times as may be designated by the by-laws of said corporation, from which the members thereof may obtain advances upon their shares of stock: Provided, That the Comptroller of the Currency, in addition to the powers conferred upon him by law for the examination of national banks, is further authorized, whenever he may deem it useful, to cause examination to be made into the condition of any building association incorporated under the provisions of this chapter, as well as any other building or loan association located or doing business in the District of Columbia. The expenses necessarily incurred in making any such examination shall be paid by such association to the Comptroller of the Currency at the time of the making of such examination: And provided further, That every building or loan association located and doing business in the District of Columbia shall make to the Comptroller of the Currency at least one report during each year, according to the form which may be prescribed by him, verified by the oath or affirmation of the president or secretary of such association and attested by the signature of at least three of the directors. The said comptroller shall also have power to take possession of any company or association whenever in his judgment it is insolvent or is knowingly violating the laws under which such company is incorporated, and to liquidate the same in the manner provided in the laws of the United States in respect to national banks: Provided further, That from and after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1909, no person, company, association, copartnership, or corporation, except corporations organized under and availing themselves of the privileges of this act, and except building associations heretofore organized and in actual operation before the passage of this act, shall conduct or carry on in the District of Columbia the kind of business named in this act, without strict compliance in all particulars with the provisions of this act. Any person, officer, or agent of any company, firm, or corporation who shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall on conviction thereof be punished by a fine or not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment not longer than two years, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court. That any willful false swearing in regard to any certificate, or report, or public notice required by the provisions of this act shall be perjury, and shall be punished as such according to the laws of the District of Columbia. And any misappropriation of any of the money of any corporation or company, formed under or availing itself of the privileges of this act, or of any building or loan association located or doing business in the District of Columbia, or any money, funds, or property intrusted to any such corporation, company, or association, shall be held to be larceny and shall be punished as such under the laws of said District."

Also, the following committee amendment was read:

Add on page 4, after line 2, the following, to stand as section 2 of the act, viz:

"SEC. 2. That there be added to the Code of Law of the District of Columbia a new section, to stand as section 691a, and to read as follows:

"'SEC. 691a. That any association or corporation organized and existing under the laws of any State or Territory to do, or now doing, in the District of Columbia, a deposit, investment, loan, or mortgage business, or otherwise having any of the features of a building association, shall be subject to all the provisions of the foregoing section of this act in respect of the powers of the Comptroller of the Currency thereover, and any such association or corporation shall at all times keep on deposit with the Comptroller of the Currency in money, or stocks, bonds, and mortgages, or other securities, to be approved by said officer, not less than 25 per cent of its capital and surplus as security for its depositors and creditors and as a guaranty for the faithful performance of its contracts, and may also make such further deposits of its assets, as above described, with the comptroller for such purpose as it may from time to time desire so to do.'"

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this a bill that belongs on the District Calendar?

The SPEAKER. This is a bill on the calendar and could be considered on Monday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It could be considered on District day?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOOD. There is a special day set apart for the consideration of these bills, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. KAHN. I hope the gentleman will not object. Yesterday the time of the committee was taken up by some of the gentlemen speaking on general subjects. This bill proposes to put the building and loan associations of the District under the jurisdiction of the Comptroller of the Currency. At the present time, although they have assets of $14,000,000, they are not responsible to a single officer of the Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I am not objecting to his personal bill.

Mr. KAHN. It is not my personal bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Or to the personal idea involved in his bill. But there is a rule that applies to this side of the House, and it is fair to apply it to that side of the House, namely, that when there are bills coming up that have a special day the individual Member must wait for that day in order to get unanimous consent for his bill. What applies to this side of the House is fair to the other side of the House. So I object.

PANAMA CANAL ZONE.

The SPEAKER. There is a special order for to-day for the consideration of the Panama Canal bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 27250) to provide for the government of the Canal Zone, for the construction of the Panama Canal, and for other purposes—the special order for to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 27250, with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 27250) to provide for the government of the Canal Zone, the construction of the Panama Canal, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the zone of land and land under water of the width of 10 miles, extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed thereon, which said zone begins in the Caribbean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark and extends to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to the distance of 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark, including all islands within said described limits and in addition thereto the group of islands in the bay of Panama named Perico, Naos, Culebra, and Flamenco, and any lands and waters outside of said limits above described which may be or from time to time may become necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, or protection of the said canal or of any auxiliary canals, lakes, or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, or protection of said enterprise, the use, occupation, and control whereof were granted to the United States by the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama, the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 26th day of February, 1904, and all other territory over which the United States now has or may have hereafter obtained governmental control, situate within the territorial limits of the Republic of Panama, shall be known and designated as the Canal Zone, and the canal to be constructed thereon shall be hereafter known and designated as the Panama Canal.

SEC. 2. That, subject to the provisions of this act and until otherwise provided by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers of the United States in the Canal Zone, including the power to make all laws, rules, and regulations necessary for the government of the Canal Zone, and all the rights, powers, and authority granted to the United States by the terms of the treaty described in section 1 of this act shall be vested in the President or such person or persons as the President shall, from time to time, designate, detail, or appoint, and shall be exercised in such a manner as the President shall direct for the government of the Canal Zone and the maintenance and protection of the inhabitants thereof in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion; and all orders and regulations with respect to the government of the Canal Zone heretofore enacted by the President or pursuant to his directions or authority, are ratified and confirmed, without prejudice to the power to revoke or amend the same.

SEC. 3. That the President, through one of the executive departments of the Government, to be designated by him, or otherwise in his discretion, shall cause to be excavated and completed the Panama Canal; and he is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one director and one chief engineer of the Panama Canal, and one governor of the Canal Zone, and from time to time to fix their compensation, duties, powers, and relative jurisdiction until such time as Congress may by law otherwise provide, and the same person may be appointed to any two of such offices; and the President may remove any of said officials at his pleasure. And the President is further authorized for the purposes described in this act to detail, appoint, and employ, or provide for the appointment or employment of such persons with such duties, powers, jurisdiction, and official designations as may from time to time be deemed necessary, and to dismiss or provide for the dismissal of the same; and the compensation of such persons shall be fixed by the President, or by his authority, until such time as Congress may by appropriation act or other law regulate the same. Any of the persons appointed or employed as aforesaid may be persons in the military or civil service of the United States, but the amount of the official salary paid to any such person shall be deducted from the amount of salary or compensation provided by or which shall be fixed under the terms of this act. Authority is hereby given for the procurement, use, and maintenance of each and everything necessary for the complete construction, maintenance, and operation of said canal from deep water to deep water.

SEC. 4. That from and after such time as the President may designate the powers and authority heretofore conferred upon the Isthmian Canal Commission shall be exercised by such persons as may be detailed, appointed, or designated by the President in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That the judicial power in the Canal Zone shall be vested in one circuit court and such inferior courts as the President may constitute. The judge of the circuit court shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; but in the event of the absence or incapacity of the judge so appointed, a judge pro tempore may be appointed by the governor of the Canal Zone. The records of existing circuit courts and all causes and proceedings pending therein shall be transferred to the jurisdiction of the circuit court hereby created as of the date when the judge appointed hereunder qualifies.

SEC. 6. That in all criminal prosecutions in the Canal Zone for felonies the accused shall enjoy the right of trial by an impartial jury.

SEC. 7. That jurisdiction is conferred upon the circuit court of appeals for the fifth circuit to review by appeal or writ of error or otherwise any final decision of the circuit court of the Canal Zone, which jurisdiction shall be exercised under rules to be prescribed by said circuit court of appeals, and unless otherwise provided shall be exercised as nearly as may be in conformity with the procedure on appeals or writs of error in said circuit court of appeals. The associate justice of the Supreme Court assigned to the said circuit may likewise designate one or more judges thereof, who may hold a term of said circuit court of appeals at Ancon, Canal Zone, at a time between May 1 and August 1 of each year, notice of which shall be published within the Canal Zone thirty days in advance, for the purpose of hearing and determining appeals that would otherwise be heard by the circuit court of appeals at New Orleans.

SEC. 8. That in any case proceeding from a Canal Zone court involving a question arising under the Constitution or treaties of the United States or involving a sentence of death or imprisonment for life, an appeal may be granted by the circuit court of appeals from its final judgment to the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court may also require by certiorari or otherwise any case proceeding from a Canal Zone court to be certified from the circuit court of appeals to the Supreme Court for its review and determination.

SEC. 9. That all expenses incurred by the judges of the said circuit court of appeals in holding sessions on the Isthmus shall be a proper charge against the appropriations for the construction of the Isthmian Canal; and there may be paid to any judge assigned to hear appeals on the Isthmus, in addition to his ordinary salary, his necessary traveling expenses to and from the United States and a per diem of $10 from the time he may leave the United States in the discharge of his duties until his return.

SEC. 10. That the President, through such officer as he may designate, is hereby authorized to grant leases of the public lands in the Canal Zone, for such period, not exceeding twenty-five years, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem advisable, reserving in all cases mineral, oil, and gas rights. No agricultural lease, however, shall be granted for a tract of land in excess of 50 hectares, nor to any person who shall not have first established by affidavit, and by such other proof as may be required, that such person is the head of a family, or over the age of 21 years, that the application for a lease is made in good faith for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation, and not for the benefit of any other person whatsoever, and that such person will faithfully comply with all the requirements of law and executive regulation as to settlement, residence, and cultivation. In granting such leases preference shall be accorded to actual occupants of lands in good faith.

SEC. 11. That no portion of the lands of the United States within the Canal Zone shall be leased hereunder unless it shall first be made to appear by a statement or plat filed under authority of the President with the collector of revenues for the Canal Zone, that it is not contemplated to use such lands in the work of canal construction or to set the same aside as a town site; and every lease shall be made subject to the provision that if at any time it shall become necessary for the United States to occupy or use any portion of the leased lands it shall have the right to do so without further compensation to the lessee than for the reasonable value of the necessary improvements made upon said tracts by the lessee and a proportionate reduction of rent, the same to be determined by the courts of the Canal Zone if not mutually agreed upon.

SEC. 12. That all laws and treaties relating to the extradition of persons accused of crime, in force in the United States, to the extent that they may not be in conflict with or superseded by any special treaty entered into between the United States and the Republic of Panama with respect to the Canal Zone, shall extend to and be considered in force in the Canal Zone, and for such purposes and such purposes only, the Canal Zone shall be considered and treated in all respects as an organized territory of the United States.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what the arrangement is as to the discussion of this bill?

Mr. MANN. I would say to the gentleman that the order under which the bill is up for consideration provides for two hours' general debate.

Mr. KEIFER. How is it to be divided?

Mr. MANN. I have taken the floor for one hour, and I suppose that the gentleman who is the senior Democrat on the committee will probably take the floor for an hour. Does the gentleman desire some time?

Mr. KEIFER. As I understand it, I desire it against the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The other hour is given to gentlemen on this side and on the other side to oppose the bill.

Mr. MANN. I will be very glad to yield such time as I can to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is primarily to provide a legal government on the Canal Zone and to legalize in effect the existing government on the Canal Zone. When we acquired our rights on the zone by treaty with Panama we enacted, in the Fifty-eighth Congress, in 1904, a bill authorizing the President to carry on the government until the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress, which expired on March 4, 1905. Congress made no provision for government of the zone after that time, but under that act of Congress a government was organized on the zone, and when Congress made no other provision for the act, the President proceeded to govern the zone as though that act had continued in force.

Whether gentlemen criticise him for it or not, there was nothing else for him to do. He did the only thing that anyone having responsibility could do. Now, this act proposes, first, by description and designation, to set out what shall be the limits of the zone, and designates a new name for the canal, now known as the "Isthmian Canal;" by this act it will be known by its proper name, the Panama Canal, merely conforming to popular usage.

It then, in the second section, legalizes the acts that have been already performed in the Canal Zone, and, following the act of 1904, which itself was a copy of the act, practically, of 1803, for the temporary government of the Territory of Louisiana under the Presidency of Mr. Jefferson, it provides that the government of the zone shall be carried on by the President and by persons named by him. There will probably be some academic discussion of the bill in regard to that. Our committee has conceived that the purpose at present of our Government on the Canal Zone is the building of the canal. We have a large number of employees there. No one knows yet what will be the permanent form of government on the zone; but it is quite evident, in our opinion, that to adopt a delegated form of government, which would turn the government of the zone over by the votes of our employees there, would be very deleterious to our continuation of the work properly.

The third section of the act practically abolishes what has been practically abolished, except in the payment of salaries, of the Isthmian Canal Commission, and provides that the President shall construct the canal, either by the aid of one of the departments or otherwise, as he pleases, and authorizes him to employ a director, engineer in chief, for the construction of the work, and a governor of the Canal Zone government.

One of the most important provisions of this bill is that in regard to the judiciary to be adopted on the zone. There is now a supreme court on the zone created by the President without any great deal of work to do, but necessarily there should be a court there. There is no appeal from that court to any court of the United States. This bill proposes that instead of providing for three judges of the supreme court we provide for one circuit judge, with an appeal to the court of appeals at New Orleans, and with an appeal from that court in certain cases to the Supreme Court of the United States. So that while there is now no method for our courts to review the proceedings of the courts on the Canal Zone, under this bill there is a method by which a man can bring his case to the courts in the United States and in a proper case to the Supreme Court.

In connection with the judicial proceedings we have provided in the bill that in all trials for felony the accused shall be entitled to a trial by jury.

Another provision of the bill authorizes the leasing of land for a term of years not to exceed twenty-five years. The land laws of the United States are not in operation on the Canal Zone. We do not sell or make any provision for the sale of any of the land there.

Mr. HARRISON. Not under the bill passed last year?

Mr. MANN. The bill did not become law.

At present the leasing can be made only for five years under our law. Now, it seemed to the committee that much of this land being so that it takes several years to clear it even for any purpose, that it is desirable to give to a tenant a longer term of lease than five years, where we do not sell the land at all, and the land which anyone can take is only a small area, and he must be a resident in good faith.

Another provision of the bill is in regard to extradition. There is now no legal method of getting a criminal from either side of the line to the other side of the line, and while it is true that sometimes they rush a man across from Panama to the Canal Zone, and vice versa, there is no method by which a criminal who may have committed murder on the Canal Zone going to the United States can be taken back to the Canal Zone for trial. In other words, if he commits murder on the Canal Zone and gets away he is as free as the air. There is no chance to get him back under the existing law, and this bill makes applicable to the Canal Zone the laws of the United States in the same manner as they apply to the Territories of the United States.

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What I desired to ask the gentleman was, What would be the difference in cost by the method adopted with reference to the higher officers of the zone of the abolition of the commissioners—what amount will be saved to the Government?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I apprehend, Mr. Chairman, there will be no substantial difference. Theoretically, there will be a considerable saving to the Government. We have now seven commissioners at high salaries; this would provide for three officials at high salaries.

On the other hand, the seven commissioners are now perfofming other duties on the Canal Zone, and probably will all remain in the employment of the Government, and I apprehend there is no substantial difference, so far as pay is concerned.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Have not the services of these seven commissioners all been required, and will they not be required, notwithstanding the law we enact now?

Mr. MANN. The services of the commissioners are not required at all as commissioners, nor do they perform to-day any substantial services as commissioners. When the first act was passed there was a commission appointed which sat in Washington. Whether they performed services or not it is not necessary to discuss. They performed some services, and they drew high pay. It became a method of construction utterly abhorrent to any ideas of proper business methods, and the President, in obeying the letter of the law, was compelled to violate the spirit of the law, and instead of having a commission as had been contemplated by Congress in its act, a commission sitting in Washington and discussing and determining these great engineering questions, he abolished that commission and constituted the only kind of a commission that could be any good—a commission of men on the ground, who were practically under the control of the chief commissioner or president of the commission.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman advise us who it is that has raised objection to the present commissioners and the method we are now pursuing in carrying on the work there?

Mr. MANN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the House never has been in favor of the commission. I think, if the gentleman will refresh his recollection, he will remember that the commission went into the bill over the protest of the House, in conference, and was agreed to only because that was the only way of getting a canal, and that afterwards the House passed a bill abolishing the commission and refused to recede from that position. That was one reason why the President was compelled to carry on the government down there. That was the reason the government bill failed in 1905.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I see you provide here that the lands on the zone shall be open to mineral entry, and so forth, saying nothing at all about the timber. Is there any timber there to dispose of?

Mr. MANN. There is no timber of any value on the zone, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDWICK. I understood the gentleman just now to say that we had a supreme court there, since the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress. It has been existing entirely, then, by executive order, has it?

Mr. MANN. Entirely by executive order.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the executive order could provide for a legal court in that Canal Zone, why could it not provide for an appeal from it?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will think for a moment, the executive order could provide that the court there might grant an appeal, but the executive order could not confer jurisdiction upon any court in the United States to hear the appeal.

Mr. HARDWICK. In other words, when the question came before a court of the United States that was bound to administer the law, the illegality of the whole action of the President in this matter was bound to be declared by the court, was it not?

Mr. MANN. That is the gentleman's own opinion. Whether the President's actions were legal or not from an academic point of view, I do not undertake to say; but there was only one thing in the world the President could do, and that was to do what he did do; and even if my distinguished friend from Georgia had been President—and I hope he may be some day—he would have done the same thing and asked Congress to ratify the proceeding.

Mr. WEBB. Do we in Congress make special laws to govern the Canal Zone?

Mr. MANN. We do not. We never have.

Mr. WEBB. Are all the citizens of the Canal Zone subject to the Revised Statutes, the laws of the United States?

Mr. MANN. They are not.

Mr. WEBB. I am leading up to this question: Then what do you mean in section 6 when you provide that all persons charged with felonies shall have a trial by jury?

Mr. MANN. Exactly what we say.

Mr. WEBB. What is a felony under the statutes of the United States or on the Canal Zone?

Mr. MANN. Felony, under the Canal Zone laws, is a crime punishable by one year in the penitentiary or more.

Mr. WEBB. Or death.

Mr. MANN. I would consider that a little more than one year in the penitentiary myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEBB. Can you tell me where we can find the law fixing the definition of felony? We have not any in the United States statutes.

Mr. MANN. No; that is true.

Mr. WEBB. I want to know where it is defined for Panama.

Mr. MANN. I will be frank with the gentleman. Doubtless if this act passes they can change the definition of the term felony, and doubtless it will not be substantially changed.

Mr. WEBB. Is it not possible for the President to do away with trial by jury entirely in the Canal Zone by defining any particular offense and saying that it shall not be a felony?

Mr. MANN. I am not sure but it might be possible to do that. If the gentleman will permit me to go further, I will say that when we went down there there was no trial by jury for any offense. There is no trial by jury for any offense except one punishable by death or life imprisonment, and that is given by executive order. The Spanish laws in force there at the time did not provide for trial by jury at all. Now, it is possible that the legislative authority which may act down there could abolish by definition of felony trial by jury, but I can assure the gentleman that if the Executive should undertake that sort of work with Congress we had better abolish the Executive.

Mr. HARDWICK. He might abolish us.

Mr. WEBB. Does not the gentleman think there are many misdemeanors that are as serious as those defined as felonies now and which are not tried by jury? I do not think any man's liberties should be taken from him without jury trial.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wants my private opinion, I am willing to give it. While the bill provides for the right of trial of all persons accused of felony by a jury, my personal opinion is that it is altogether too broad, and we ought not to do it. That is not all; I will say further that the great majority of the people on the Isthmus accused of crime do not want a trial by jury. They are used to being tried by the courts and still prefer to be tried by the courts. I do not agree with the gentleman that assault and battery cases should be tried by jury down there.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I notice in the first paragraph of section 10, the officer appointed by the President is given almost unlimited discretion in making leases of land up to twenty-five years.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman mean by "any amount?"

Mr. DOUGLAS. Any amount of land.

Mr. MANN. I am afraid the gentleman has not read the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Oh, yes; I have read the bill thoroughly.

Mr. MANN. I mean that part of the bill in which there is a limitation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am talking not about "agricultural leases," so called, but other leases. I have read the bill very carefully.

Mr. MANN. Any lease that is not a town lot is an agricultural lease.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Might it not be for timber land? There is nothing in this paragraph that prevents granting a lease for twenty-five years to any company that wants to exploit timber lands.

Mr. MANN. It would be an agricultural lease; there is nothing else there. It is all agricultural land.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No timber?

Mr. MANN. No; no timber of any value; nothing except a little land and some water. Now I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BENNET of New York. How many different kinds of courts are there down there?

Mr. MANN. The supreme court, the circuit court, and the police court. The supreme court consists of three members, each of whom holds the circuit court.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I ask the question because this bill provides only for the transfer of the records of one court, and does not provide for the balance of the cases in the other courts. What becomes of the cases in the other two courts?

Mr. MANN. It does not affect the other courts at all.

Mr. BENNET of New York. It seems to me that under section 5 all these other courts will be superseded.

Mr. MANN. The courts down there are the circuit courts, and they are the only courts of record.

Mr. BENNET of New York. What is the supreme court?

Mr. MANN. It is the court of appeals.

Mr. BENNET of New York. What is the circuit court?

Mr. MANN. The judges of the circuit court sit in banc as a supreme court.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Is the police court a part of the circuit court also?

Mr. MANN. Not at all; and not a court of record.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I understand that.

Mr. MANN. They are police magistrates.

Mr. BENNET of New York. What are the justices of the peace such as we have here called?

Mr. HUBBARD of West Virginia. That is the district court; there are five of them.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Does not the gentleman think the rights of the minor tribunals ought to be protected?

Mr. MANN. Those courts will be continued.

Mr. BENNET of New York. There is nothing in this bill to continue them.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; there is nothing in the bill to continue them and nothing to abolish them. That is for the President to determine; he has created them.

Mr. BENNET of New York. True; but if there are new courts and no express provision to continue these——

Mr. MANN. They are not new courts; we do not interfere with the district courts.

Mr. BENNET of New York. But you provide for new ones.

Mr. MANN. We authorize the President to do that which he has done; give our congressional consent and sanction to it.

Mr. BENNET of New York. To ratify his acts in the past and authorize him to do acts under the statute in the future.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. And therefore the same situation will arise that arose in the Dakotas and Idaho and all those Western States, when they changed the United States courts out there and simply transferred the records and found they conferred no necessary powers on the new court.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. The district courts down there will not be changed in the slightest degree. Under this act we make no change in the district courts at all. The district courts will continue unless the President abolishes them. We do not change the laws that are there now in force.

Mr. BENNET of New York. So far as the act is concerned you do.

Mr. MANN. Why, we ratify the act which constitutes the district courts. We ratify the law which constitutes the district courts.

Mr. BENNET of New York. But do not continue the courts.

Mr. MANN. We do continue the courts. We do not abolish them.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. These district courts were created under the original canal act.

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. How were they created—by executive order?

Mr. MANN. Created by the President.

Mr. NORRIS. This bill, then, continues the executive orders; still gives him the power to continue those courts?

Mr. MANN. Let me say to the gentleman, under the authority which was conferred upon the President in the Fifty-eighth Congress, which expired with that Congress so far as the act of Congress is concerned, and which he has continued to exercise since, he has provided a whole code of laws and government on the zone. We ratify all the acts already done in regard to that by this act, and then confer upon the President the power to continue in the same way a government down there; but we do not wipe out the laws which he had established, one of which constitutes the district courts.

Mr. NORRIS. What particular part of this bill gives or continues the authority of the President to continue those courts?

Mr. MANN. Section 2.

Mr. CHANEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. CHANEY. I would ask the gentleman if the government down there has fee-simple title to all the lands aside from that owned by individuals?

Mr. MANN. No; the government owns the land which is turned over with the Panama Canal purchase from the New Panama Canal Company. The Panama Railroad Company is owned by the government. The Panama Railroad Company owns a considerable amount of land. In addition to that there are the individual holdings of land. So that, practically, the government owns all of the land except what the individuals own, but we do a large part of it through the Panama Railroad Company.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the leases to which the bill refers are to those particular lands.

Mr. MANN. Only to the lands that are owned by the Canal Commission, now a part of the canal works.

Mr. CHANEY. Would it not, in the opinion of the gentleman, be necessary for the future civilization of the zone that some of this land be authorized to be disposed of by fee simple?

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that the Government, I think, is not yet prepared to say what land may or may not be necessary in connection with the construction, operation, fortification, and maintenance of the canal, and hence it is not desirable to give away any land which, perchance, we might have to purchase back.

Mr. CHANEY. I make this inquiry only because of the fact that when we were down there at the canal they expressed their desire that people should come there and settle there and remain there and live, in order that they might have an agricultural country.

Mr. MANN. I may say to the gentleman that the provisions in the bill on that point entirely meet the views of the officials down there, who have been most anxious to have some of this land cultivated.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have not read the bill carefully, but I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. The Panama Railroad Company owns practically all the lots in the city of Colon and owns some property in the city of Panama. Is there anything in the bill that would prevent a conflict of jurisdiction between the authorities of the government organized under this bill, as a government and the jurisdiction of the courts of Panama with respect to the commission of offenses in Colon or on property in the city of Panama belonging to the United States?

Mr. MANN. I do not quite catch the gentleman's drift. I should say not, if I do.

Mr. TAWNEY. The point is this: The Panama Railroad Company owns all of the lots in the city of Colon.

Mr. MANN. I may say to the gentleman that under this bill we retain every possible power that we can have under the treaty with Panama.

We are asserting all the power that we claim under the bill. There is some dispute in reference to how far that power goes, but we do not yield it in this bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Under the first section of the bill, our government in the Canal Zone as it will then be organized will have supreme jurisdiction over all the territory described in that section, which includes——

Mr. MANN. The Canal Zone, you mean?

Mr. TAWNEY. All that is there now or may hereafter be acquired.

Mr. MANN. You said the Government of Panama had control of it; I thought you said the Government of the United States.

Mr. TAWNEY. Now, it is a fact the Government of the United States does own property in the city of Panama, and the Panama Railroad Company, which the Government owns, owns practically all the lots in the city of Colon, and it is a question whether your language would not give the United States jurisdiction over this property in the two cities and whether, in the administration of justice, there may not arise a conflict of jurisdiction between the Governments of Panama and the United States.

Mr. MANN. I give the gentleman credit for what he said in the beginning—that he has not carefully read the bill——

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask the gentleman if there is anything to prevent such a conflict of jurisdiction?

Mr. MANN. There is absolutely nothing in here that makes a conflict of jurisdiction. We have no sovereignty over the lands owned by the Panama Railroad Company within the cities of Colon and Panama, and we assert no sovereignty over it in this bill or otherwise.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under section 3 of the bill, is any additional authority given to the President to complete the construction of the canal?

Mr. MANN. No additional authority is given the President.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the same section, page 4, the bill provides:

> Authority is hereby given for the procurement, use, and maintenance of each and every thing necessary for the complete construction, etc.

Under this authority, is it necessary to have specific appropriations made for the acquisition of the various materials required?

Mr. MANN. That is existing law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me illustrate what is in my mind. Under this provision of the bill the President or those designated by him have authority, for instance, to contract for the purchase of steamboats for use in transportation of materials without specific authority.

Mr. MANN. I do not think he would without an appropriation. Now, if the gentleman will permit, the purpose of putting that provision in the bill is in order to permit the Committee on Appropriations to have the authority of law for the appropriations they may bring in.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The intention is, however, to continue the practice as far as possible, of specifying the different services, material, and so forth, to be acquired.

Mr. MANN. I put that amendment in the appropriations act, if the gentleman will remember, struck it out of a bill which I had in the House, requiring estimates to be made in detail, which means appropriations in detail.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I had in mind the question as to whether this will in any way affect that provision.

Mr. MANN. I should say, without question, it would not affect that at all. They would still be required to make estimates in detail, and expenditures in accordance with the appropriations in detail.

Mr. FITZGERALD. One other question. This bill authorizes the President to designate one person to hold one or more offices. Does not the gentleman think that the person so designated should be limited to one salary; that instead of having an official receiving so much compensation for the discharge of duties of one office and then some other compensation for some other office, that persons employed on the canal should be paid a specified sum for their services in whatever office they might hold?

Mr. MANN. I do not think so, for this reason: The purpose of this provision in the bill is to permit the President, if he desires—take the case of Colonel Goethals—to name him both as director or engineer or any other designation he may have for a position. Now, under the bill the President fixes the salary of these officials, but Congress acts by appropriation bill or otherwise, and it is six of one and a half dozen of the other whether he fixes the salary for two offices or one salary for one office; the committee still have control and Congress fixes the salary anyhow.

Now, I say to the gentleman, while there might be one person drawing two salaries, he may hold two offices down there and only draw one salary. We thought it would be an insult to put such provision in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not. We have seen it frequently in our experience here where a salary is fixed by law for the performance of duty in certain offices.

Mr. MANN. If we fixed the salaries by law, we would have put it in, but we do not do it unless we fix that hereafter, and if we do that that will control the situation, and the gentleman's committee will doubtless control it when they make the appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would affect the case in this way: A man is appointed to an office and his compensation is fixed by that office. Then he is given some additional duties under some additional title, and he would not be given those duties if he did not have ample time in which to perform them; then that is immediately used as a basis for giving some additional compensation on the theory that the additional duties necessitate additional services requiring additional compensation. My judgment is this, that the services of the man should be fixed and he should be paid a certain amount as a salary in one lump, and not attempt to conceal what he is getting by separating it among different sums.

Mr. MANN. It would not be concealed. Nothing is concealed that goes to the gentleman's committee. It has to pass the inspection of the gentleman, who watches everything like a hawk watches a dove. So if one person acted as both director and engineer, he would not receive a larger salary for the two offices than if you had two persons holding those two places.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But if he were able to perform the duties that are specified as belonging to two separate offices, when in effect that would be one office, I think he should receive one salary, whatever the amount would be, and not receive two so-called "salaries" for the purpose of unnecessarily increasing his compensation.

Mr. MANN. I assume all that he will receive will be one salary, but it will be larger if he holds two offices with this responsibility than it would be if two men held the two offices.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used thirty-five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Then, I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN. Is there a circuit court in the Canal Zone?

Mr. MANN. Circuit judges; yes.

Mr. MARTIN. I will call the gentleman's attention again to the question suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET]. It is true that while in section 2 there is a general ratification of all acts of the President, section 5 specifically disposes of all judicial jurisdiction in the zone from now on, and it passes jurisdiction to a circuit court and to such inferior courts as may be constituted by the President.

That apparently looks to the future, and would, I think, be an abandonment of the inferior courts heretofore provided for.

Mr. MANN. I do not agree with the gentleman about that at all. I think he is mistaken about that. If that were true, then we would have to adopt a very different bill concerning everything down there.

Mr. MARTIN. Consistent with that view, later, in paragraph 5, I call attention——

Mr. MANN. The whole bill is based upon the theory that the existing law remains down there when we confirm it, before it is changed by somebody; but the gentleman assumes that by confirming a law, we abrogate it. I do not agree with that.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman allow me just a moment? The gentleman from Illinois will notice that in the latter clause of paragraph 5 a particular provision is made for the transfer of all records and cases to the circuit court. There is no provision for the transfer of cases to such inferior courts, as the President, under the first part of section 5——

Mr. MANN. The inferior courts are not disturbed, I may say to the gentleman, nor are the courts of record there.

Mr. MARTIN. Are the circuit courts disturbed?

Mr. MANN. The circuit courts are abolished by the act. We specifically abolish the circuit court by creating a circuit court in place of it.

Mr. MARTIN. Do you not consider that you abolish the inferior courts now existing by providing that the "judicial power shall be vested in one circuit court and such inferior courts as the President may constitute," apparently looking to the future?

Mr. MANN. We have confirmed the act giving to the President the power to constitute these district courts, and they continue.

Mr. MARTIN. Do you not also confirm the acts of the President constituting the inferior court?

Mr. MANN. That is what we do.

Mr. HUBBARD of West Virginia. Let me state to the gentleman, the first line of the second section shows what is done with respect to these district courts and is covered by the language there and is expressly made "subject to the provisions of this act," and the provisions of this act make regulations respecting the new circuit court.

Mr. MARTIN. To which section do you refer?

Mr. HUBBARD of West Virginia. To the first line of section 2.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman needs to disturb himself about this. This portion of the bill was worked out not only by the committee, but by the very eminent counsel of the commission. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HELM. I understood the gentleman to state that the purpose of this bill was to abolish the commission on the zone.

Mr. MANN. That is one of the purposes.

Mr. HELM. Now, I observe that all laws enacted on the zone, if they may be so called, or orders issued on the zone are enacted or issued by the President of the United States on the authority of the Canal Commission. Now, if you abolish that commission, with whom or where is authority to legislate lodged or vested, and where shall this authority rest in regard to the Canal Zone?

Mr. MANN. It rests with such persons as the President may designate.

Mr. HELM. For legislation?

Mr. MANN. The President will select some one to legislate and enact and control the Canal Zone.

Mr. HELM. I presume that will be the only legislative authority on the zone.

Mr. MANN. There will be enacted certain legislation, whether it will be done by executive order; yet I do not know what the process will be. That has been the process up to this time.

Mr. HELM. As I understand you, the Isthmian Canal Commission is to be abolished?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Then where would these recommendations for the origin of legislative recommendation to the President arise?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I may say that we do not propose to abolish having somebody in control. There will be people in control of the work and people in control of the government, just the same as they are now. "Isthmian" is a mere figment, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. HELM. Then it will be simply an appendix to the United States?

Mr. MANN. That may be the gentleman's opinion. If he asks me, it ought to be cut out if it is. [Laughter.]

Mr. HELM. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago that the title to the property on the Canal Zone is vested in the United States. Is it not true that under the treaty with Panama this Government only has the right to construct, operate, and maintain the canal, and the right to maintain a civil form of government, and to enforce such sanitary measures as the Isthmian Canal Commission may see proper?

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is.

Mr. HELM. Is it not a fact that we do not own the fee in the Canal Zone? Is that not true?

Mr. MANN. That is not true; the gentleman is mistaken about that. We own the fee to the zone.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not only a difference in name, and is not the legislation there done by the Canal Commission simply an executive decree?

Mr. MANN. Oh, if the gentleman prefers—if it suits his conscience better to call it an executive decree; but, if he wants my opinion, I will say to him that I think it is legislation.

Mr. SIMS. You call it legislation. Do you regard it as legislation.

Mr. MANN. I regard it as legislation.

Mr. STERLING. This bill abolishes the supreme court now in existence in the zone.

Mr. MANN. It is supposed to.

Mr. STERLING. And it abolishes two of the circuit courts?

Mr. MANN. I am sorry it abolishes one or two constituents of my colleague.

Mr. STERLING. It abolishes two out of three, does it not?

Mr. MANN. I am free to say it abolishes the three.

Mr. STERLING. Two out of three of the circuit courts?

Mr. MANN. It abolishes three.

Mr. STERLING. And establishes one?

Mr. MANN. It establishes one by this act of Congress.

Mr. STERLING. There are now three established by act of the President?

Mr. MANN. And under the act of Congress one.

Mr. STERLING. And it has original jurisdiction in all criminal cases except misdemeanors, I suppose?

Mr. MANN. Well, I suppose so; I can not say what Congress will do about it. He has jurisdiction down there.

Mr. STERLING. Does he have appellate jurisdiction in misdemeanors?

Mr. MANN. I can not answer the gentleman.

Mr. HUBBARD of West Virginia. He has some.

Mr. MANN. It would not make any difference what he has now. They could change it at any time if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. STERLING. What jurisdiction has this court now in civil cases?

Mr. MANN. I can not answer the gentleman; and if I could, I would not take the time to give all the jurisdiction. The court there has jurisdiction just like the court in the gentleman's own State and in my own State. If this bill becomes a law, the legislative authority can change the jurisdiction, just as they can in our State.

Mr. STERLING. Under this bill the litigants have no appeal on the zone. They must go to the circuit court of appeals of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Under this bill it is provided that the circuit court of appeals shall go to the zone. That is what the bill provides.

Mr. STERLING. And that is the only redress they have from the circuit court down there. Would not that be a very expensive proposition?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wants my opinion, it would not be an expensive proposition at all.

Mr. STERLING. I think it would.

Mr. MANN. That is a difference of opinion.

Mr. STERLING. I suppose I am entitled to that.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; but it is plainly not an expensive proceeding.

Mr. STERLING. I know it is expensive to get into the court of appeals here in any kind of case, and probably would be more so there.

Mr. MANN. There is hardly any litigation on the zone that will have to be appealed. There is scarcely any litigation on the zone. There are three judges down there now with nothing to do, and they do nothing to speak of.

Mr. STERLING. I wish to say that if this bill passes there will not be much litigation that is appealed, if it has to go to the circuit court of appeals of the United States.

Mr. MANN. But they have no place to go now.

Mr. STERLING. They have the supreme court, have they not?

Mr. MANN. They have a supreme court composed of the three circuit judges.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; and that is infinitely better than requiring a litigant to submit his rights to one man. Then he has no choice of the forum.

Mr. MANN. If I were in the gentleman's situation in reference to this matter, I should doubtless take the same position that he does.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I notice that the third section provides—

That the President, through one of the executive departments of the Government, to be designated by him, or otherwise in his discretion, shall cause to be excavated and completed the Panama Canal.

I wish to ask the gentleman, Would not that authorize the President to change the type of canal from lock level to sea level?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; the law expressly provides for a lock-level canal.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. But from reading this section it occurs to me that it gives him plenary power in the construction of the canal.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman would not make that contention if he would read the law again.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I am stating to the gentleman how it appears to me. I would be inclined to think that the careful consideration which he and his committee have given it would give him a better judgment than my own, at first blush.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, the first section of the bill describes the canal, and provides that it shall be called the "Panama Canal." That has reference to existing legislation. Then we provide that the President in this way shall construct and complete the canal; because the existing law provides that he shall do that through the Isthmian Canal Commission, and we repeat the language practically, only leaving out the Isthmian Canal Commission; but he is still subservient to the other provisions of the law defining what the Panama Canal is.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I should like to ask the gentleman another question, which he may not want to answer. I should like to know whether the President-elect has been consulted in the matter of this provision?

Mr. MANN. He has.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I believe, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. I have answered the question. Now, is the gentleman going to give the President's opinion?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. No; I am not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why should the President-elect be consulted?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. If the gentleman will permit me to answer, it seems to me, for this reason——

Mr. MANN. I have only a little more time left, and I have promised time to some other gentlemen. The gentleman from West Virginia can have time under the five-minute rule. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that it makes much difference what my position may be in this matter. I began twelve years ago ardently to advocate canal legislation. My judgment, together with the judgment of our committee and of this House, was in favor of the Nicaragua route, but we were overruled, and then we acquiesced in the selection of Panama. Then I, together with a great many others, preferred the sea-level type of canal. We were overruled in that. Yet I do not concede that I have entirely failed in everything. The fact remains that canal legislation has been secured, and is in operation. I still desire to secure a canal, and I do not wish to obscure that purpose nor lose sight of it in premature disputation and contention about other considerations that at this time are not necessary.

When we began work on the canal a great many gentlemen of good intentions, jealous for constitutional liberty, anxious to see theory in their minds put in practice down there, apparently lost sight of our purpose, and offered elaborate and detailed systems of legislation. Our committee and this House resisted their hasty schemes. We enacted, as far as applicable to the Canal Zone, temporarily the act under which the Territory of Louisiana was temporarily governed upon its acquisition by this Government. Louisiana was designed to form a portion of our great Republic and become the home of millions of American citizens.

We went to the Isthmus to dig the canal, not to found a colony nor seek homes for our people, but, as expressed in the treaty, in the act of Congress, in speeches everywhere, to dig a canal; not to look out for impossible places prematurely to exploit theories of government, where there were no people nor industries, nor commerce for them to operate on. In the name of liberty and all that is good, there is scope enough here at home for the talent of all statesmen to inaugurate and practice beneficent schemes of government. [Applause.]

I am opposed to anarchy; I am opposed to absolute government. I am in favor of free, constitutional, republican, democratic government by the people themselves for their own benefit. But at Panama we have practically a government reservation only. We have there no permanent citizens of the strip building homes and engaged in agriculture, manufacture, and commerce. We have there a few nondescript people not our own, but the people in that strip who know or care anything about government are our own citizens, who live not there, but live and retain citizenship in the States from which they went to the Isthmus. Here is their citizenship and here their citizenship will remain.

I have resisted premature framing of a permanent system of government there. We do not know what we will want. We do not know what we will have. We do not know what the citizenship will be. We do not know what the conditions will be when the canal has been finished and opened for use. Our only warrant for the construction of the canal is military and naval use. We have no constitutional power to construct it for commercial use. It is a fine place for a military and naval reserve. We know if we should succeed in the lock system that we will have a magnificent basin above these locks for the congregation of ships, and a splendid place in that strip to collect and organize a military or naval expedition, as well as to collect naval and military stores and equipment.

It is entirely premature to talk about permanent citizenship, and permanent courts, and permanent juries, and permanent legislatures, and all that when we have nothing but a number of employees in the strip, carried there for the sole purpose of digging a canal. Let us keep everything out of the way and dig the canal. [Applause.] When we have done that, let us provide permanently for a system of government according to conditions existing at that time.

The act, copied from the act for temporary government of Louisiana, expired by limitation with the Fifty-eighth Congress. It did so because we as conferees from this House in conference with the other great body of this Congress failed to secure an agreement in our contention to abolish the commission to which this House has always been consistently opposed.

In my judgment, the only thing necessary now is to reenact that temporary act so that it shall remain in force until such time as Congress can properly adopt a permanent system for the control and management of the zone. I am willing to couple with it, as we did, the abolition of the commission, because this House has always opposed that. Since the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress the President has correctly proceeded de facto to exercise the powers which he had begun to exercise during the life of that statute. I am willing to revive that statute which a part of this present bill proposes to do.

Inasmuch as it is the duty of the President to exercise such authority, maintain and protect our possessions, preserve order, proceed with the construction of the canal, and protect the people engaged in the construction, we ought, in my judgment, to give him the authority and sanction of express law. Most of the other parts of the bill are matters of detail, and the infinite diversity of opinion entertained by Representatives upon all those different features, everyone anxious to embody his own ideas, demonstrates more clearly than words can express the bad policy of undertaking to enact a system of government before we have somebody to govern, and in a place where there may never be anybody to govern. It is not true, as alleged, that we hesitate to frame a government because we do not know the conditions on the Isthmus. We object to premature legislation for the reason that we do know conditions on the Isthmus, and that they are such as do not require, at this time, the adoption of a permanent code of laws, nor will such be required until the canal is completed and in operation. Then developments, producing permanent and, in my judgment, entirely new conditions, will require legislation which would, perhaps, not now be appropriate at all. The adoption of an ill-advised system now might fasten it upon us to our detriment and be hard to get rid of. Until that time it is unwise for us to embarrass or complicate the great enterprise in which we are engaged by undertaking, considering, or administering anything except what is merely incident to the construction of the canal. Certainly order can be preserved and the men engaged in the great work clothed, fed, and protected without any great danger to the liberties of our people or the principles of our great Government. Nobody denies that everything is working smoothly and satisfactorily on the Isthmus, and that the temporary government under executive order is affording protection, maintaining discipline, administering justice, and rapidly constructing the canal. The only objection is that the President is exercising autocratic power, and a hundred different Members want to substitute a hundred different schemes of legislation, all of which might do to govern a people, but none of which is suitable for the most rapid construction of a canal in a country where we have no other business at this time, and where there are no people to govern except those under contract with us. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed nine minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. I object to this bill from a standpoint of policy, as well as from principle. As I am advised, most of the provisions of the bill are unnecessary because they are but a repetition of existing law as applicable now to the Panama Zone. I believe that it is an inopportune time for Congress, by such legislation as this, to call the attention of the country to the fact that a change of the executive, administrative, as well as the governmental, policy of the Canal Zone is necessary.

A great many drastic criticisms, through the public press and otherwise, about the Panama Canal have recently been indulged in, which undoubtedly have had a disquieting effect in the public mind. Many well-informed people, apparently sincere in their convictions, earnestly contend that the Government made a vital blunder in preferring a lock-and-dam canal instead of a sea-level canal. So strong, earnest, and demonstrative was this sea-level sentiment that President-elect Taft, on his recent visit to the Isthmus, carried with him six expert engineers to look over and carefully examine the plans for the construction of the lock-and-dam canal as adopted by Congress and to see whether the same is in accord with the most modern and best engineering skill and ability, and whether the work in carrying out this plan was being efficiently, economically, and honestly performed.

We ought at least to await the report of those engineers. I say it occurs to me that under existing conditions this is an inopportune time to take any steps for a change in either the executive or administrative policy of the Canal Zone. I simply refer at the beginning of these remarks to one section in this bill. I think that the bill is but a repetition in nearly all of its provisions of the rules and authority that have been existing on the Canal Zone for years, and a careful scanning and perusal of this bill will disclose the fact that it is but a repetition of rules and provisions declared by the President of the United States and that have been heretofore enforced. I desire to call especial attention to section 2, which is the leading vital feature of the bill, for all other sections are secondary to its provisions. Let us look at section 2 of the bill, and I will read it:

SEC. 2. That, subject to the provisions of this act and until otherwise provided by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers of the United States in the Canal Zone, including the power to make all laws, rules, and regulations necessary for the government of the Canal Zone, and all the rights, powers, and authority granted to the United States by the terms of the treaty described in section 1 of this act shall be vested in the President or such person or persons as the President shall, from time to time, designate, detail, or appoint—

And I pause to ask any gentleman on the floor of this House, Has not the President been doing just what I have just read? To continue—and shall be exercised in such a manner as the President shall direct for the government of the Canal Zone and the maintenance and protection of the inhabitants thereof in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion; and all orders and regulations with respect to the government of the Canal Zone heretofore enacted by the President or pursuant to his directions or authority are ratified and confirmed, without prejudice to the power to revoke or amend the same.

It is claimed that the President of the United States since the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress has been, under the provisions of the act of Congress of April, 1904, making and enforcing law on the Canal Zone without authority. The authority conferred on the President in section 2 is too broad. Such authority is not in accord with our republican institutions. Why, I ask, this restiveness about the authority that the President has been exercising on the Canal Zone?

But the astonishing thing connected with the unlimited power that this section confers on the President and that has been enforced in the Canal Zone for years past is that it is to be ratified and confirmed; but such ratification and confirmation will not deprive the President of the power to revoke or amend the same. This virtually gives the President the authority to revoke or amend an act of Congress. No such power as this was ever before conferred in the history of our Republic on a President of the United States. I ask if that is not the sole object of this bill? In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, it is proposed to change the judiciary. My distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] failed to read the hearings that took place on the Canal Zone before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee within the last month. We had before us Judge Gudger, who had recently been appointed chief justice, and in answer to a question propounded to him he said:

Our object has been to have our people try the cases. The life of a criminal case in our courts is about three weeks from the time the crime is committed until it is out of court; that is, not a capital case. The civil cases must be tried or the parties must get out of court within a reasonable time, but there are three cases now on the docket which have been there for two or three years. We have made every exertion to have them tried or dismissed within a reasonable time.

Mr. HUBBARD of West Virginia. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; just a question.

Mr. HUBBARD of West Virginia. That is, whether or not that same gentleman did not say—

I am thoroughly satisfied that the business (referring to the business of the courts) in the zone will not increase, and so far as the trial of cases is concerned that one judge can attend to all the business.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; and afterwards he said that the best and most economical administration of justice was in the courts, as now organized, and he said further:

We try cases in this country more rapidly than is the case in the United States, because we have no juries, but we are handicapped by virtue of the fact that many of the litigants are Spanish, many of them French speaking, and a large number of Chinese, and these speak foreign languages, so we have to have interpreters.

In reply to the suggestion to send a federal judge to hold court on the zone, he said:

I do not know how much they would allow that man. He would be a regular federal judge in the United States; he would come here with a salary of $6,000 or $7,000 a year. Do you think that would save money to the Government? I think the amount would be so small that it would not compensate for the other difficulties and troubles, and I say further that our judicial system, as a whole, is little expense to the Government. The expense of all our courts amounts to practically $43,000, and the income from all sources in our offices amounts to $33,983; I have the exact figures. There is a deficit of only $9,017 as between our receipts and disbursements, and that includes salaries of all clerks connected with the courts, judges, interpreters, janitors, rent of buildings, actual running expenses, etc.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then you do not think it can be more economically administered than now?

Judge GUDGER. That is my judgment.

And what is the substitute that this bill proposes? It is to take a federal judge from the fifth circuit, with headquarters in Louisiana, and send him over there among those people to whom he is a stranger; and you know and I know that the courts are administered with more harmony and with more dispatch of business by the men who live among the people that they know than by a judge who is sent from across the water to administer their rights in the courts. It is not any economy in any way at all.

Mr. Chairman, there are other provisions of this bill to which I would like very much to call attention, because the real purpose of the bill is to alter the judiciary and abolish the commission, and that is all there is in it. As I said, section 2 is the headlight of this bill. In the time allowed me I can not fully present my views on all the provisions of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Georgia, who is temporarily absent, has authorized the Chair to recognize the gentleman from Alabama for three minutes longer.

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is nothing else in this bill but to abolish the commission, alter the judiciary, and have one judge instead of three and ratify all the acts and the works of the President there in the last four, five, or six years.

I believe that if a sea-level canal had been adopted we would have heard just as much, if not more, complaint, based on the ground that it ought to have been a lock and dam canal. Under these circumstances and surroundings, at this particular sensitive juncture of canal interest and affairs, why should Congress give impulse and character to the disturbed, distrustful feeling throughout the country by enacting a law that certainly can not be considered absolutely indispensable? I do not hesitate to say for myself that on my recent visit with the members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House and others to the Panama Canal many of my preconceived prejudices and objections were removed by the opportunity given to personally look over the work at the Gatun dam and examine the slip that had taken place on the southern toe of the dam, see the material that had formed the slip, note the depression in the embankment, have all these matters thoroughly explained by competent engineers, and, as a layman, apply your common sense. It occurred to me that the magnitude of that slip and its importance had been greatly exaggerated in this country, and that its significance tended to strengthen the belief of the engineers having in charge the construction of the great Gatun Dam that a sufficient and safe foundation to bear the great weight of this dam has been established. Unquestionably, if the material that was pressed so heavily by upper weight of the embankment had been resting on unstable or a miry foundation, it would have gone downward and would not have made the slip on the outside.

We stood in the great Culebra Cut and had explained to us the advantage that we had gained, that I had never heard of before, in the trade that we made with the French by utilizing something over 28,000,000 cubic yards of dirt that the French had taken out of the Culebra Cut. It was told to us and pointed out to us how the French had gone down, and that we had taken out an additional 31,000,000 cubic yards of dirt and had probably 30,000,000 more to take out before the canal could reach its proper level. All such matters were generally and fully explained to us, and appealed to us as laymen from a standpoint of common sense. We can better understand what progress has been made in the matter of excavation when we recall the fact that during the month of August, 1907, something over a million cubic yards of dirt was excavated, and during the corresponding month of August, 1908, over 3,000,000 cubic yards of dirt was excavated.

Of course one of the great problems in accomplishing success in the construction of the Gatun dam relates to seepage, and not the seepage on the outskirts of the dam or under its foundation, but such a seepage of water as would lower the level of the lake impounded by the dam. It is, of course, admitted that the surrounding hills near the Gatun dam are the result of prehistoric volcanic convulsions, and scientists tell us that such convulsions frequently result in leaving in their trail crevices, cavities, and seams in these hills which are invisible to the eye. It is natural to believe that when the water submerges these hills nearest to the dam, the water on the dam being 85 feet high the hills will become saturated and the water will gradually seep into these seams, crevices, and defective places and find an outlet in some other way than through the lake, and thereby reduce the level of the water impounded from 85 feet. It is a danger that no engineering skill is able to compete with any more than it could compete with an earthquake in the future. All of the safeguards and precautions have been taken by the officers in charge to find out whether these defects exist in these hills. Reservoirs have been established, and as yet no evidence has been given of the escape of the water.

I do not hesitate to say that I believe that the chief engineer and his associates in charge of the work are honest, competent, and faithful, and if left undisturbed by unnecessary interference and legislative changes, will successfully complete the canal on the plan adopted by Congress, and give to our Republic the glory it well deserves of conferring upon the nations of the world an inestimable benefaction. [Applause.]

In connection with the construction of the canal three great vital and important problems have already been successfully solved. The failure of either one would have a great effect in obstructing the construction of the canal.

The first is, that Congress, based on the opinion of competent engineers, determined to build a lock-and-dam canal. Therefore the plan for building the canal is settled, and it is unwise and hardly patriotic to urge at this time that in selecting the lock-and-dam canal we made a great and vital blunder and ought to have selected a sea-level canal. It would be just as appropriate for the Members of this House who all, almost unanimously, voted to support the Nicaragua route to contend now that we ought to go back to Nicaragua and build the canal there. The great world project has passed, in my opinion, the period of discussion. Success now, on the plan adopted, should appeal to our national pride and stimulate us to give aid and encouragement that will help the able men in charge of the work.

The second great problem solved is, the splendid sanitation wrought under the direction of the great intellect of Doctor Gorgas. To-day the Panama Zone is rated as one of the healthiest place in the Tropics, when heretofore it was a cesspool of disease and death. One of the great drawbacks that the French met was the fatality of the disease encountered in that tropical climate. The line of the Panama Railroad was a veritable graveyard, and the dead train, I am told, left Panama every morning and gathered the dead bodies between there and Colon. To-day the death rate of Panama falls but little below the death rate of the cities of the States. This question, I say, has been solved, and successfully solved.

Of the three problems that have been solved, one of the most important in connection with the building of the canal is the housing and feeding of the army of employees in that work. Colonel Goethals and those associated with him have demonstrated a capacity for organization and discipline that challenges the admiration of everyone. I was particularly impressed with what was apparent, that the humblest as well as the highest employees of the great work were profoundly interested and had pride in the successful construction of the canal.

The Government pays good wages, based on the gold standard and the silver standard. Every engineer and employee connected with the railroad service receives 65 cents in gold per hour; and every employee, labor from the West Indies, and so forth, being paid on the silver basis. Everything has been done by the Government to give satisfaction and contentment to the laborers, because without this great trouble would arise. Hotels have been built along the line of the Panama Railroad and wholesome provisions provided at the very cheapest rate, affording the laborer the opportunity to make money and send it home.

And it is under this wise policy that the question of securing labor is no longer one of doubt. The labor necessary is easily provided, for it has gotten out over the country what the policy of our Government is in reference to this labor. The difficulty of accomplishing this can well be understood when it is known that 52 different nationalities represent the laborers at work on the canal, and yet it has been done and the work is progressing in the most methodical and businesslike way.

For myself, I saw no evidence of waste or extravagance. I do not believe that graft or an improper or dishonest appropriation of the vast sum of money appropriated by the Government can be successfully charged or maintained; but we hear some people say that the expense of the construction of the canal will be more than double the estimated original cost. I have no doubt myself that it will exceed or double the estimated original cost of the canal. I am advised that we have expended already something over $80,000,000, and if it does not exceed $300,000,000 before the time we get through I think the American people ought to be content and satisfied. Everybody regrets that the cost of the canal will exceed the original estimate, but, I say, what man will stand up to-day before the American people and contend that for that reason we should abandon the work? The man who would do that exaggerates the love of money by the American people, and has but little appreciation of the pluck and pride of the people of our great Republic.

We have put our hands to this great job, and with due regard to economy and an honest appropriation of the money provided, our Government will not take its hands off this job until it is completed.

As I said in the opening of my remarks, the surest way to succeed in completing the canal is not to interfere with the present order of things prevailing on the Canal Zone. If under the present rule of matters success awaits our efforts, then let it alone. The proposed legislation is unnecessary, and for that reason harmful. Let Colonel Goethals and his able and competent associates work out the problem, and for one I believe by their ability and skill it can be done. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, this bill as reported from the committee does not meet in all of its features my approval. If we had the time, and if I could control it, I would, Mr. Chairman, enact laws to govern the people upon the Panama zone, certainly our own citizens who reside there or who will be there until the completion of this canal, such as we would enact for all of the citizens of the United States, wherever they may be found. I am as strong an opponent of the government by executive order or decree, or enactment of laws by commissions, as anyone, but I can not shut my eyes to the fact that it is better for Congress to enact some sort of laws, and to recognize those laws, if they are good laws, that have already been enacted, even though they may have been enacted in a way that does not meet our approval, than to leave matters to exist on the Isthmus as they are, which means chaos and confusion.

This is the greatest engineering work probably ever undertaken in the history of the world and is expected to be carried on to a successful completion for the benefit of the commerce of the world, and mainly for the benefit of the commerce of the people of the United States and the protection of our people in time of war. There is no section of this great country of ours that is more deeply interested in the successful completion of this work than the section that I have the honor to represent. And while we may not, as we do not, approve the questionable methods, as I believe them to be, by which the Panama Isthmus was secured, and while we may fear, as we do fear, that the future historians will properly write about that transaction in a way which will not reflect great credit upon the United States, yet, from investigation and inquiries and from personal visits to the Isthmus, I believe that the completion of this work will be accomplished and will be carried out as now is proposed and expected by those in charge of the work.

But in order that the five thousand—and the number may increase monthly and yearly—of American citizens who are compelled to reside in that zone may be given some semblance of law, some protection to person and property, some proper way in which to settle the rights of person and of property, and the proper procedure by trials in court, I have consented to at least acquiesce in, if I do not agree with, all the provisions of this bill. It is far better, in my opinion, that the bill this committee has reported should be passed than to leave the zone as it will be without the bill, to leave executive usurpation and power full and free way. I confess that if I had the time and the power to write a bill for the government of the zone I would not write it as this one is written in many particulars. I would not leave to the Executive the power to decree or repeal what law should exist in the zone. The chief and most forcible objection is the fact that power is conferred upon the President to enact laws, either himself or through commissions or officers that he might create or appoint.

I am opposed to that fundamentally, and yet I recall the act of 1803 relative to Louisiana, that the greatest patriot and the greatest lover of the liberties of the people, he who wrote the Declaration of Independence and proclaimed the fundamental doctrine of the Democratic party, on an occasion where a territory was acquired in which there was no government, recommended and Congress passed an act giving to Jefferson the same power and the same authority that this act in very language gives to the President of the United States.

I think it well to read this act with reference to the Louisiana territory that had been recently acquired by purchase, just as the Panama Zone was. It reads:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That until the expiration of the present session of Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of the said Territories be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same shall be vested in such person and persons and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of Louisiana in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will my colleague allow me a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, the gentleman knows very well that this power was vested in the President for but one session of Congress.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. It says "until the expiration of the present session of Congress."

Mr. HARDWICK. In the case of 1803, which you state is exactly the same, it was only to continue during one session of Congress, and yet your committee comes now with a proposition that is to make it permanent.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Oh, no; and to violate a principle for a day is bad. I confess to my colleague, and nobody knows better than he, that this grant of power to the Executive to decree or enact law does not meet my approval. However, I prefer to continue to grant this power—the same that Jefferson had in Louisiana—than to permit to continue the laws under which these thousands of people now live and submit on the zone to have no jury trials and no right to appeal their cases to our own courts. In other words, between two great evils I undertake to accept the lesser; and when it is stated that we are granting power to the President to make law, either by himself or through a commission, I recall that under similar conditions the first great President of the party to which I have the honor and am proud to belong requested like authority, and it was granted by Congress. Of course I know it was not abused in that instance. It is not my duty nor my privilege, probably, to say whether it has been abused since 1904 by the present Chief Executive. I will say, however, that I have less fears in intrusting it to the incoming President than I did have in 1904 to intrust it to the then President.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have had upon the zone until February, 1908, no trial by jury at all. Men were convicted of capital crimes and sentenced to be hanged by one judge or by two judges. That is corrected by this bill. In an executive order of February, 1908, the President provided for trial by jury in capital cases, and that is now being done. But with my love of liberty for the citizens and my veneration for the jury system, and from experience as a practitioner of law and as a judge, as well as from love of the doctrines and traditions handed down to us by our forefathers, who established this system in England, I was not willing to vote for any bill that would deprive from the right of trial by jury the people upon the zone. Therefore I insisted that there be incorporated in this bill the right of trial by jury in every case of felony, and the necessary provision has been made.

Personally, I am not like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who is not in favor of it. This is the provision for trial by jury in every felony case, which means that in every case where the fine exceeds $25 and the imprisonment thirty days a man on the zone will be entitled to the right of trial by jury, as is provided for in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him what are the qualifications of the jurors?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. There is nothing in this bill prescribing what their qualifications shall be. There is one prescribed in an executive order.

Mr. CANDLER. That is what I am inquiring about.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. It does not provide that they shall be citizens of the United States, but does provide that they shall be able to read and write and understand the English language. That is all.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. HELM. Do you know whether it is a fact that three men have been tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hung on the Canal Zone without the intervention of a jury?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I have stated a few moments ago that three men were under sentence of death who had been convicted without being tried by a jury.

Mr. HELM. Is it not a fact that one of them has been hung?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. No, sir; he was respited by Colonel Goethals upon the day that he was to be executed, and I heartily congratulated him on doing that.

Now, I say every man who may be charged with an offense for which he may be fined $25 or imprisoned thirty days under this bill will have a right to trial by jury. I have succeeded in getting that much upon this bill.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. GILLESPIE. You say that the qualification of the juror is simply that he must be able to read and write the English language?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The qualification required by the executive order makes it so that nobody but white jurors are selected.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Unless you have got that qualification of "white" in there you will have 26,000 Jamaica negroes on the jury.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. No; you will not, under the officials appointed by the chairman of the commission, Colonel Goethals, who may draw and select the persons qualified to serve as jurors; I will tell you that. No one but white Americans have yet been selected. And so far as the American negro is concerned, we were told that they do not want him down there for any purpose, and rather encourage his not going there; that they were a nuisance and an interference to the transaction of business being carried on, so far as that was concerned, and were mostly given to creating disturbances, and raising questions of equality and asserting their privileges and rights as citizens of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we here propose to approve and ratify the laws as they have been enacted by the Canal Commission and approved by the Executive. The Canal Zone laws are contained in this pamphlet. Having examined them, I confess that they are very admirable in many particulars. They are copied from many of the laws of the States of the Union. The same rights are guaranteed, and the same offenses are punished in most particulars, except as provisions peculiar to that locality are made. In this other pamphlet are the laws of procedure; and so far as I can learn it is very admirable from the standpoint of those who understand and favor the procedure under what is known as the "civil law" and the practice under that system.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Under this jurisdiction given to the supreme court in the Canal Zone will it be possible, for instance, to take the editor of the New York World from New York and extradite him to the Canal Zone and try him there for criminal libel, as is contemplated under the present processes which are being experimented with?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I do not think that under the law of the United States as it now exists and has existed for over a hundred years you can try the editor or the publisher of a newspaper—the New York World—for the alleged libel which is now the subject of public inquiry. I do not believe the offense alleged is one that can be tried anywhere in the United States, in the Canal Zone, in the Philippines, or in Porto Rico, or anywhere according to the laws of the United States. As long as the question has been asked me, I do not believe that libeling the Government of the United States is an offense that can be committed in this country since the repeal of the sedition laws of 1800.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Would there be any difference between the jurisdiction of the supreme court of the District of Columbia and the jurisdiction of the circuit court in Panama? If it would be valid here, it would be valid in the Canal Zone, would it not?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I do not think so. I do not think under this bill that it would.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that owing to interruptions the time of the gentleman from Georgia has been consumed.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia three minutes more, if he desires it.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman. I have said about all that I care to say except that, reluctant as I do feel to support a measure of this character—because I do not believe that as a general rule any people should be governed by orders from the Executive or by laws made anywhere except in the forum of the people authorized by the Constitution to enact law—yet, facing conditions, and not merely a theory, that exist on this Canal Zone, realizing the importance of the proper conduct and looking to the completion of this great work, which when completed means so much for our entire country and for the section from which I come and for the whole world, when we have secured to the people on the zone, as we have in this bill, a right of trial by jury in cases where it has not existed heretofore; when in additon to that we have put into this bill the right of a man in every case, whether civil or criminal, to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States where questions involving the Constitution are concerned and in capital cases, as well the right to bring any case up by certiorari, I think that, for the time being at least, we can afford to vote for this measure rather than to leave anarchy and chaos to reign on the Isthmus, without law from any source.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, although my views on the general subject are firm and unchanged, and will remain unchanged to the end, yet I believe that on account of the peculiar conditions that surround this work, because of the fact that the Supreme Court has but recently refused to take recognition of the jurisdiction of cases from the courts now established there; since we have not by legislative enactment provided for an appeal to the Supreme Court, rather than let the only law or procedure in court be by executive usurpation longer, and without the sanction of Congress, the lawmaking power. I have consented to support this bill, though it does not in many important particulars meet my approval. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, when the time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] expired, my attention was otherwise engaged, or I would have yielded to him additional time. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] had just told me that he was embarrassed for time. Therefore I desire that the additional three minutes granted to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] be charged to me.

Mr. MANN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] twelve minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will vote down this bill. Certain features of the bill unquestionably offer an improvement upon existing conditions in regard to the government of the Panama Canal Zone, but, in my opinion, certain other features of this bill are so poisonous in principle as to corrupt the whole body of the bill.

These features, briefly stated, are: First, those contained in sections 10 and 11 of the bill, in which we are asked to vote to the President the right to make land leases on the Canal Zone, which, in my opinion, is in derogation of the rights of the courts to pass upon land titles, and therefore obnoxious to every Democrat and every strict constructionist.

A second particular in which I am unalterably opposed to the bill is contained in the second paragraph of the bill, in which it is proposed to give to the President once more the right and authority to conduct all civil and military government on the Panama Canal Zone, and to make all rules and regulations to that effect.

In the last session of this Congress a resolution passed the House of Representatives calling upon the President to inform us by what authority of law he had been continuing his personal government in the Canal Zone since the expiration of the Fifty-eighth Congress. In response to that resolution the President replied that he found his authority in certain acts of Congress, which he enumerated, and which I propose to discuss with great brevity.

The first thing to which he refers as conferring the authority upon him for his autocratic government in the Canal Zone is the treaty between the United States and Panama, where the United States acquires the "use, occupation, and control" of the Canal Zone, and also—

> All the right, powers, and authority within the zone mentioned which the United States would possess and exercise if it were a sovereign of the territory.

Well and good; that certainly gives us practical sovereignty over the zone, but does not confer on the President any right of personal government.

The next act he cites is the act of January 28, 1902, called the "Spooner Act." In the Sponer Act the President is thereby authorized to acquire certain rights and also jurisdiction over said strip and ports at the ends thereof—

> To make such police and sanitary rules and regulations as shall be necessary to preserve order and to preserve the public health thereon, and to establish such judicial tribunals—

And so forth.

This unquestionably confers upon the Congress of the United States the right to legislate in this respect, but I can not understand how it is claimed that it confers on the President the right to establish a government of personal legislation upon the zone.

The act of April 28, 1904, is the next act upon which he relies. That is one that has been often cited in the debate here to-day, and in its express terms limits the authority of the President to maintain personal government on the zone to the life of the Fifty-eighth Congress and expires with that.

The next act to which he refers is the act of March 3, 1905. That is an urgent deficiency bill of that date, and it contains a provision that so much of the sum which has been heretofore appropriated to run the Panama Canal Zone and was still unexpended might be expended, and "the commission is hereby revived and continued until the beginning of the next session of Congress." No authority by the wildest stretch of imagination is given him by the Fifty-eighth Congress to proceed further than the convening of the next Congress.

The next act to which he refers is the act of December 21, 1905. That is an act supplemental to the Panama Canal act, and in this the President is authorized "to call upon the persons who are employed to take charge of the government of the Canal Zone" for annual reports. That is all. The other acts to which he refers—June 30, 1906, and March 4, 1907—are further appropriation acts.

Now, it is perfectly clear to all of us, and it is evidently clear to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, that the authority of the President, in spite of his somewhat laconic message in answer to the House resolution, expired with the life of the Fifty-eighth Congress. The gentleman from Illinois himself admits as much in his report, and he has again done so in his remarks this morning.

But the gentleman from Illinois goes on to say that on the expiration of his authority the President, "with a high degree of statesmanship," undertook to continue the civil government. I would ask the gentleman whether the aggrandizement of executive power at the expense of the legislative is his idea of high statesmanship [applause on the Democratic side] and whether he believes that simply because we have moved down into the middle of the Central American Republics it is necessary for us to have the Central American form of government in any Territory of the United States? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The President was able to see in these acts of Congress to which he refers authority to continue his autocratic rule upon the zone. What an amazingly penetrating vision! What a great gift such a vision as that is! Why, Mr. Chairman, when the President gets to central Africa there will not be a wild beast on the continent lurking within the jungles that will be safe from that keen vision. It is no wonder that with a vision like that the President was able to perceive in an apparently healthy army surgeon the first signs of physical decrepitude which necessitated his retirement in order to accompany the President upon his trip!

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to increasing the scope of executive power in the Canal Zone and elsewhere. I am particularly fearful of the consequences in the premises, because I dread the possibility of the extension of the scope of activities of Mr. William Nelson Cromwell. I do not find under our American form of government any place for an international intriguer or for a professional revolutionist. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] and his colleague [Mr. ADAMSON] have both cited as an apparent precedent the act of Congress at the time of the Louisiana Purchase as the reason why Democrats in this House should vote now to give the Executive unbounded personal authority over the Canal Zone.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. For a question.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I did not cite that as a reason why Democrats should vote for this bill. I simply cited it to show why I will vote for it.

Mr. HARRISON. I accept the gentleman's correction. So far as he is concerned, he does not approve it, but he is going to vote for the bill. The other gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], however, has unbounded approval for such a measure as this.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I beg to correct the gentleman. I am not talking about a permanent system of government for a State. I am talking about building a canal and I do not want to get lost in anything else. Therefore, I say, let the President build the canal right now.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I understood perfectly the scope of the gentleman's remarks. He and I differ somewhat as to what he calls "permanent" and what he calls "premature." I will come to that in a moment. Meanwhile I wish, if possible, to controvert his statement that the act of Congress of 1803 giving President Jefferson this authority over the newly acquired Louisiana Territory was any precedent for action in this case. I have in the last session of Congress entered very fully into a discussion of the history of our country in the establishment of military or de facto governments in our newly acquired territories. I will not detain the committee at the present moment with a further discussion of that, but I wish to reiterate my former statements that the absolute authority given to President Jefferson was given to him under the apprehension that at any time a war might break out between the settlers on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers on the one side and the Spanish at the mouth of the Mississippi River on the other side as to the rights of deposit and navigation of that river. Moreover, in that case we were incorporating into our public domain a region as vast as the whole of the Untied States of that day, a region for the great part utterly unknown even to explorers and to trappers. No wonder that the Congress of the United States hesitated to frame a permanent form of government under those circumstances. They limited to the session of Congress in which the act was passed the authority to govern given to President Jefferson, and within eleven months the Congress framed a form of government for the newly acquired territory and put in charge of it as civil governor the then governor of the Mississippi Territory. That condition of affairs and this one to-day are as far apart as the two poles. In my opinion it is absurd to cite the Louisiana Purchase as a precedent for action of similar sort now.

The Panama Canal Zone, about 20 to 22 miles long and 10 miles wide, is as well known to Members of this House by personal inspection, I dare say, as is the home city of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and I dare say that the Members of this House are as fit to prepare a civil form of government for that territory to-day as is the legislature of the State of Illinois to prepare a charter for the city of Chicago. I see no reason for this continued delay on the part of Congress. When the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce brought in its bill five years ago I opposed it upon the floor and offered a bill of my own. I may say in passing that this bill incorporates two or three of the provisions of the bill which I offered at that time and which so far as I can see might just as well have been enacted into law at that time.

Mr. MANN. O Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is mistaken about that. This does not incorporate any of that bill. Is the gentleman proud of that bill?

Mr. HARRISON. I am proud of certain features of it. I think the situation down there would have been vastly improved had we enacted it into law at that time.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I want to say to the gentleman I think so, too, and I wish I could get his bill, but I can not.

Mr. MANN. I am glad somebody thinks so.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, at the time that committee brought in that bill the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], a gentleman for whom I have the most profound respect and admiration, stated upon the floor of this House that the measure was purely temporary in its nature, and these are his words.

He referred to some remarks that I had just made, and he said I need not be—

> Disturbed by the fear of extension of autocratic power on the part of the President, for, by limitation, clear and explicit, this act will expire with the end of this Congress. This is only a temporary measure, and was adopted because the committee did not have the information and could not acquire the information that would be necessary for the establishment of a permanent government.

What the gentleman from Iowa meant by "temporary" is borne out by a newspaper interview which he gave out at the same time, in which he said:

> Therefore, in view of the fact that the commission would return during the summer after having studied the subject, and that we would then have some accurate information, we concluded that we would postpone all detailed legislation until that time, and that during the six or eight months that would intervene the President would have ample power to do everything that would be necessary about it.

In the course of "six or eight months," he says, while five years have now passed and we are again asked to renew that autocratic power. If some legislative Rip Van Winkle reappears on the scene in the Eightieth Congress, he will find the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce urging the Committee of the Whole again to place in the President autocratic powers similar to those requested in this bill. Mr. Chairman, I hope the Democrats in this House at least will vote against this bill. I consider it a most pernicious precedent; I consider it most un-Democratic, most un-Republican, and most un-American. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WANGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On February 8, 1909:

H. R. 8050. An act for the relief of James R. Wyrick.

On February 9, 1909:

H. R. 2952. An act for the relief of Chaplain Henry Swift, Thirteenth Infantry, U. S. Army; and

H. R. 27427. An act to prohibit the importation and use of opium for other than medicinal purposes.

GOVERNMENT OF CANAL ZONE, ETC.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the discussion of the gentleman from New York, for whose opinions I always feel a profound degree of respect, but I am unable to agree with them with reference to this bill. I believe, gentlemen, that this bill is a distinct improvement upon the existing situation, and I commit myself to its provisions with pleasure. We have from the distinguished gentleman from New York a criticism of this measure because it permits the Executive to make leases of lands, and yet almost every day of the year an executive department of this Government is making leases of the public lands within the domain of the United States. My reply to that proposition is that if the Interior Department can exercise the power to make leases or be trusted with the exercise of the power to make leases within the domain of the United States on its public lands, then the President of the United States certainly can be trusted with the power, as conditions now exist upon the Isthmus of Panama.

The second proposition raised by the gentleman from New York is that this bill gives the Executive an undue amount of power, and Congress is criticised for reposing that power in the President. It is said that the President, since the expiration of the Fifty-ninth Congress, has repeatedly and wrongfully exercised the powers of government on the Panama Canal Zone, the limitation fixed by act of Congress having expired. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that when this Government acquires unorganized territory the duty devolves upon Congress, under every decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, to legislate for the government of that territory, and when Congress prescribes by its legislation a limitation, then the duty devolves upon the Congress to extend the legislation or enact better legislation. But, gentlemen, when a government once exists, I do not understand it as a principle of law that when a limitation of that sort expires, when Congress fails to exercise its power to legislate, that the government is abolished and no government exists, but that a state of anarchy arises. Let me ask, gentlemen, whether or not, when this limitation expired and Congress failed to legislate, whose dereliction that was? Was it a dereliction upon the part of the Executive or upon Congress itself? I for one am unwilling——

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I can not yield now. I for one am unwilling to criticise the executive branch of this Government for continuing a government which Congress has expressly approved and refused to repeal heretofore, which was its duty if it did not approve of the government which had been established. I will say to him I believe, as a lawyer, that the President was warranted in continuing the government which had been established on the Panama Canal Zone. But, passing to the consideration of this bill, I think it is a distinct improvement on the existing government there, and that is why I am going to vote for it.

I want to see the Panama Canal completed, and I believe the gentlemen here who want to see that great enterprise consummated will join with me in voting for the provisions of this bill. I want to say to you that the judicial features of this bill are, in my humble judgment, a distinct improvement over existing conditions. Under this bill the right of trial by jury, which does not apply in unorganized territories except as extended by Congress, is guaranteed to the people on the Isthmus of Panama. I may say that, under the decision of Dorr against the United States, it was held that until Congress extended the right of trial by jury it did not apply in unorganized territory. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the importance of this bill has been somewhat exaggerated by some of the gentlemen who have agonized over conditions upon the Isthmus and the terrible destruction of our institutions which will ensue by the passage of this legislation. Your Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have designed to meet conditions down there in a practical way.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the gentleman in favor of the bill?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I hope this will not come out of my time.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course not; but I want to say this, Mr. Chairman, that there ought to be some sort of a division of time between the gentlemen in favor of and those opposed to the bill. Nearly all the time has been consumed by gentlemen in favor of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Does this inquiry come out of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has the floor. He asked a parliamentary question.

Mr. HARDWICK. A parliamentary inquiry. I want to know, considering how the time has been consumed, how much of it by the friends of the bill and how much of it by the enemies of the bill, whether or not the gentleman who is now undertaking to take the last ten minutes is entitled to use that ten minutes against some gentleman who is opposed to the bill?

Mr. MANN. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that, having taken the floor, under the rules I was entitled to one hour's time and to yield such portion of it as I please. The gentleman made a mistake in not rising and asking for recognition.

Mr. HARDWICK. Has the hour expired, I will inquire of the gentleman? I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the hour has already expired, and therefore the gentleman is not entitled to the floor any longer.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. My hour has not expired.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the gentleman's hour has expired.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER of Vermont). The Chair will state to the gentleman that he is mistaken about that. The Chair was not constituted then as it is since this discussion arose, but the Chair understands that the gentleman from Illinois rose and was recognized for one hour, and that he reserved the balance of his time when he surrendered the floor. There are ten minutes left, which ten minutes he has yielded to his colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. The Chair understands the same situation was true with reference to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], who was recognized for one hour in opposition, and that time was used by him and the persons to whom he yielded time. Now, of those two hours there are only ten minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] has been recognized.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, let me say the decision is all right——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thanks the gentleman.

Mr. KEIFER. As to the fact of the apportionment; but when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] commenced his speech he agreed to yield time to those opposing the bill out of his hour, and now he does not do so.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. I can not let a statement like that go unchallenged.

Mr. KEIFER. There are a hundred men here who heard him make the statement.

Mr. MANN. I would have been very glad to yield to the gentleman, as I said to him I would yield if I could.

Mr. KEIFER. You did not qualify it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLMSTED). The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the real purpose of this bill has been somewhat obscured. This country is upon the Isthmus of Panama for the purpose of constructing a great canal, the greatest engineering work of the age. The type of it has been settled by Congress to the acceptation of the American people. Coincident with the construction of the canal it is the business of this Government, of this Congress, to establish some sort of civil government among those people who are engaged in that great enterprise. It is for the inestimable advantage of that great work that the right kind of a civil government be established among them. If that be not done, chaos and anarchy will ensue among the people engaged there; and the construction of the canal will be greatly delayed, if not entirely defeated. For that reason your committee has deemed it necessary to procure the proper information and draft a measure adapted to actual conditions as best it could, designed to facilitate the work and improve the conditions there during the construction of that great canal. For that reason it has brought in a measure in the form that it is before this House.

In listening to this debate it is difficult to realize the mental point of view of some gentlemen who oppose this measure. They oppose it because it grants to the Executive, the President, large authority in the zone in connection with this Government. It seems to me they must realize that if this bill fails there will yet remain upon the zone and controlling its people a larger authority, which they denominate as usurpation on the part of the President. Your committee has realized that it is best to legislate by the legislative branch of this Government. We believe this Congress should lay down the policy of the Government for governing its territory and possessions wherever they may be, and that our people should realize that legislative control should prevail and that executive domination should cease as soon as possible. It is for that reason that this bill is drafted to create a legislative government for the Isthmus of Panama, instead of an executive government, which exists now. We prefer that there should be a legislative government, constituted by Congress, controlled by Congress, upon rules laid down by Congress, rather than a government laid down and carried on by executive will only.

Mr. Chairman, during the past few years men have been tried for their lives and sentenced to death under executive order, a condition that is intolerable to American civilization and that ought to merit legislative action. There ought to be some form of law created by that department of government whose duty it is to make law which shall provide the procedure with reference to such affairs. It is for that reason this bill has been framed; and it is a remarkable thing that Members rise upon this floor and try to defeat a measure like this, when we try to constitute a legislative government upon legislative rules and substitute legislative proceedings in place of what they denominate a usurpation, when they know that that usurpation will continue if this bill be not passed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, unless some such measure as this pass, the construction of the canal will be impeded in various ways, its officers must be engaged upon frivilous duties instead of attending to the more important duties, and the only method of establishing law upon the Isthmus must be by an executive order of the President. It is the only way it can be done now under existing conditions. We want to improve conditions and make them the best possible for the construction of the canal. This bill does change by providing officials on the Canal Zone whose official duty it shall be to study conditions; and remember that conditions change rapidly. A force of men who may be on the northern part of the canal to-day may be on the southern part of it a week from to-day. A condition that requires legislative action to-day at Colon or Christobal will change entirely in three months and need another legislative act in order to meet the then existing conditions. No one would pretend that sort of new and speedy action could be done by act of Congress. We know how difficult it is to legislate for little matters of this kind in this District of Columbia, to govern one of the most important cities of the United States. We have tried in vain to pass a penal code through this House. But this little territory is 2,000 miles away, with only six or seven or ten thousand white people and 30,000 colored people dependent upon conditions of this act, and we are asked to set aside some of our valuable time for the purpose of legislating for the petty details of government down there. The very mention of that thing to people intrusted with the important duty of legislating in this House ought to be sufficient to convince them that we are adopting the right course to facilitate the construction of that canal—to fit the laws we make to meet the conditions as they actually exist and need remedy.

Now, this sort of government is temporary in its nature. It is not designed to be permanent. The conditions fluctuate and will change as long as the canal is under construction. When the canal shall be completed and conditions become more permanent, then we can take up the question of what ought to be the permanent government for that canal strip. Nobody can foresee now what kind of a government ought to fit the conditions then. Nobody can now study it. What we are trying to do is to have a form of government that will assist the executive officers in this work of construction right now.

Now, what do we do? The first thing we provide is that the President is charged with the duty of legislating, by means of officers whom he appoints. That has been often done in our history. He appoints executive assistants down there and these officials will be constantly at hand. They are charged with the great work of constructing that canal, and in the process of doing that work they can incidentally carry on this government by making the proper legislative decrees, orders, or acts, whatever they may be.

There is one thing we do by this bill, to which we call the attention of this committee and the House. We make the courts independent of the canal government. At the present time the judges are appointed by the commission, or in whatever way they may arrange it. We provide that this circuit judge, who is to take the place of the three circuit judges now in office, shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and shall be entirely independent of the local government to preserve the rights and welfare of American citizens there. Now, there has been some criticism of the fact that we have abolished the system of three judges, and that we provide for only one. That is done because there is very little legal business on the zone. The report for 1908 shows that there were only 17 sessions of the supreme court, and only about a dozen or 15 cases were considered. The circuit court had only about 82 civil cases for the year in the whole zone. There are less than 10,000 white people there, and the others have no litigation at all. There never can be but little civil litigation there. It is practically all criminal, and the bulk of the cases are petty. One judge will have hard work to spend one-third of his time in doing the work there on the zone, if he has it all to do. Any Member on the floor will realize, from his own experience in his own district, how much judicial work there would be among 10,000 white people who do not engage in active personal business of their own, but who are employed upon a great enterprise like that. There will be very little litigation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is evident to everybody that if we have highly paid judges on that zone, with nothing on earth to do, it is a demoralizing spectacle to the other men on that zone who have work to do and who are not paid as much as those judges. For that reason, for the purpose of doing away with that scandal that now exists in having three judges there where one is more than is necessary, for the purpose of averting that source of scandal, we have abolished these three judges.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the order of the House, general debate has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill by sections under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That, subject to the provisions of this act and until otherwise provided by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers of the United States in the Canal Zone, including the power to make all laws, rules, and regulations necessary for the government of the Canal Zone, and all the rights, powers, and authority granted to the United States by the terms of the treaty described in section 1 of this act shall be vested in the President or such person as the President shall from time to time designate, detail, or appoint, and shall be exercised in such a manner as the President shall direct for the government of the Canal Zone and the maintenance and protection of the inhabitants thereof in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion; and all orders and regulations with respect to the government of the Canal Zone heretofore enacted by the President or pursuant to his directions or authority are ratified and confirmed, without prejudice to the power to revoke or amend the same.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. I desire to move to strike out the section, and I believe that is preferential.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] would have precedence if he desires to perfect the section. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 24, strike out "or" and insert "and," so that it will read: "The President and such person or persons," etc.

Mr. DRISCOLL. My opinion is that the President does not divest himself of the power, but that it is vested in the President and such persons as he may designate.

Mr. MANN. That matter was considered in the committee and we were inclined to think, and so was the counsel for the canal commission, that the word "or," in this case, was better than the word "and" and would give the power to the President to confer this authority upon other persons, whereas the word "and" would require both the action of the President and the other persons.

Mr. DRISCOLL. It strikes me that he may have the power and confer the authority.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman whether this happens to be a thought that comes to him now, or whether he has deliberated over the question?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I have deliberated over it for an hour or two.

Mr. MANN. As originally prepared, the word "and" was in the section, and that was stricken out and the word "or" was inserted intentionally; because it was thought that the President might desire, instead of exercising this power himself, to confer it upon some officials in the Canal Zone, and in that case it ought not to be required that he should join with them in the law.

Mr. DRISCOLL. If the committee have considered it and still stick to the opinion that "or" is the better word there than "and," I will be satisfied to defer to their opinion, although I beg to differ with them.

Mr. MANN. I base my opinion somewhat on the opinion of Mr. Rogers, counsel for the canal authorities, one of the best lawyers in the country.

Mr. DRISCOLL. If the gentleman wants me to withdraw the amendment, I will do so.

Mr. MANN. I do not want it adopted.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, I will withdraw the amendment. I want to ask one further question. On line 8, page 3, it says "without prejudice to the power to revoke the same." In whom is the power vested, in the President or in Congress?

Mr. MANN. It is vested in the President. Of course, Congress retains control at all times. We could not divest ourselves of the power. Here is what we wish to do: We permit by this act the laws to be put in force. We do not wish to say that they are confirmed so that they can not be amended, and without that provision, when we have confirmed the laws, that would be an act of Congress that the President could not change, and therefore we leave it subject to be amended or revoked as the situation may require. Congress could not divest itself of authority to amend the act. This is a power left to the President and to those persons whom he may designate to exercise legislative power.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Frequently when Congress makes a grant it reserves the right and the power to amend, repeal, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. That is in relation to private grants. This is a public law.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the entire section. I do not know that I can add anything to what has already been said, but I would not feel right if I let this occasion pass without expressing my sentiments on this iniquitous measure, as I look at it.

Mr. Chairman, five years ago, I think, when I first became a Member of this body, I remember that one of the most forceful speeches I heard on the floor fell from the lips of my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who, in presenting a bill of this character to this House, stated that he presented a proposition for the temporary government only of the Canal Zone. The gentleman referred to the Louisiana case as a precedent, and it was a fair conclusion from his remarks that his committee would not require a longer time than was taken in the Louisiana case to make a reasonable investigation and report some system of laws for the government of this Canal Zone.

Five years have elapsed from that day to this, and yet we are now right where we were then. The same committee comes in here with another proposition for temporary government, to bridge over a temporary emergency.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the most remarkable arguments I ever heard in my life are advanced in support of this proposition by gentlemen who advocate it on the floor of the House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says that unless we vote for this bill we are voting for chaos and disorder, and, according to the view of some of us, governmental usurpation on the Isthmus of Panama.

If the distinguished occupant of the White House were to seize the reins of power at this moment and assume dictatorship over this entire country, the argument would be exactly the same, and if some gentleman would rise and move that Congress pass a resolution ratifying the action of the President in assuming to be dictator over this country, it would not be a vastly different situation than for gentlemen to tell us here today that unless we vote to give the President this extraordinary power he will exercise it anyhow, as he has been doing, without authority of law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that this is a clear abrogation of congressional duty. Under the treaty under which we acquired it, the Canal Zone is as much a part of the territory of the United States of America as is Alaska, as is Arizona, as is New Mexico, and it is just as much our duty to provide some civil government for the territory we acquired under that treaty, and by virtue of its terms, as to provide for the government of any other Territory in the United States.

For one, I am now and have always been and will be forever opposed to executive lawmaking. I would not favor a proposition that the governor of my own State should make the laws under which my people are to live. I would not favor a proposition that the President of the United States should make the laws under which the citizens of the United States are to live. I do not want to vote for any bill or any section under which tens of thousands of American citizens who are on the Isthmus engaged, it is true, in the government service and in public works, but none the less American citizens, may be tried under the laws framed by executive order. Never can I support such a proposition.

I want laws made according to our Anglo-Saxon theory of government, by some lawmaking body, by the Congress of this United States, by our state legislatures, and in no case by the executive, national or state. It is undemocratic, it is not right, it is not just, for gentlemen on the Interstate Commerce Committee to go on for five years without providing any system of government, when they are as thoroughly familiar with the conditions on the Isthmus of Panama and in the Canal Zone as they are with the conditions of any State in the Union, and then seek to pass a drastic, revolutionary measure of this character on the specious plea of "temporary necessity and pressing emergency."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I shall not use even the five minutes, but I want to say this: I am earnestly opposed to this bill. It is autocratic. The Czar of Russia never had in his palmiest days greater powers than it is proposed to give to the President of the United States, and not even temporarily, if gentlemen will take time to read the provisions of section 2 of this act. I do not believe in autocratic government. I do not believe in one-man government. I believe the Congress of the United States is here to legislate for the people of the United States, for the government of its territories, and for the regulation of the inhabitants of those territories and of everybody who happens to go to them, and I do not see why, after five years of continual and constant visiting, junketing trips, this particular committee and the Members of this House are not competent now to deal with this question, instead of just coming to us and saying, "You must turn it over to the President of the United States, because if you do not, he will take it anyhow." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia will prevail. In my opinion this is the most obnoxious feature of the bill. I further believe that it is unconstitutional. The original founders of this Republic intended that we should keep separate the three branches of the Government; and yet this specifically hands over to the executive branch of the Government the sovereign power given to the legislative branch, namely, the right to make the laws. The advocates of this measure maintain that the reason why we should give this power to the President is that we do not know enough about the conditions of the Panama Canal Zone to make the laws ourselves. In the name of common sense, why, if we do not know enough to make such laws, should we turn them over to the Executive and ask him to make them? I believe that the Congress of the United States has never descended to such depths of self-abnegation as this measure proposes. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], in answer to my argument, maintains that if we were not to pass this measure anarchy would obtain on the Canal Zone. It is the duty of the President, Mr. Chairman, as Chief Executive, to see that anarchy does not prevail in any of the Territories over which the United States has control. It is his duty to see to the enforcement of the police and sanitary regulations on the Panama Canal Zone and elsewhere where he can exercise similar control. But it should not be put in his power to pass such laws as he has been attempting to establish by executive order upon the Panama Canal Zone, where he has abolished of his own volition the laws already established through the instrumentality of the Panama Canal Commission. He abolished all forms of local self-government, and made a more complete autocracy than has ever been fixed upon American soil, an autocracy which would have made envious a pro consul of Rome in the days of the decadence of the Roman Empire. Mr. Chairman, there is enough law down there now to maintain the status quo. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce should bring in a bill to establish a complete form of civil government for the Panama Canal Zone. I see no reason why they have not done it. They have had six years since the ratification of the treaty by which we obtained practical sovereignty over this strip, and yet, in spite of that, they still claim that we do not know enough to make the laws for this Panama Canal Zone. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia will prevail, and that the committee will, at least, strike out this obnoxious provision of the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I think that after reflection the gentlemen who have last spoken will somewhat modify their views and will conclude that this proposition is not "undemocratic," that it is not "unconstitutional," and that the government that has been established there is not "that of a pro consul of Rome." I am quite sure they will think so because there is some very excellent precedent for just this kind of government, and that precedent was established by men who were supposed at the time, and for many decades after the time, to be excellent Democrats, and the precedent was established at a time and by Congress when there was a large number of its membership who had been either cotemporaneous with the adoption of the Constitution or members of the constitutional convention or those who had participated in the discussions that led to the adoption of the Constitution, and who might well be supposed to know what was within the power of the Congress and what was within the domain of democracy. The precedent that I call attention to I will read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That until the expiration of the present session of the Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of said Territories be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same shall be vested in such person and persons and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct, for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of Louisiana in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Not just now—later. Mr. Chairman, Thomas Jefferson signed that bill and made it a law. It was Democratic doctrine. It was by a Democratic Congress, and yet it gave to the President every power that is conferred on the President of the United States by the bill now before this body.

Who talked then of the "pro consuls of Rome?" Who talked then of its being un-Democratic and not in harmony with the institutions of the Republic? Who talked then about its being unconstitutional and an usurpation of power, a bestowal of power far beyond the domain of the Congress? Ah, gentlemen, it was constitutional then, it was Democratic then, it was benign, it was beneficent——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing). It was for the purpose of preserving the liberty and the religion of the people——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. HEPBURN. Not now; not now. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, these gentlemen have either forgotten their history or they have changed their politics and their constitutional views. Which is it? Mr. Chairman, this bill is perhaps not all that the gentlemen would have made it; but if they were familiar with the situation, if they knew of the conditions in the zone, if they knew of the needs of government they would be content, I think, with this—that is, when they became satisfied that it was constitutional and that it was Democratic, and that that arbitrary power vested was not that which would be given to a "pro consul of Rome." Mr. Chairman, the people there are there for temporary purposes. There is no reasonable probability that any large number of the 30,000 inhabitants of that zone will be there ten years from now. The probabilities are that the population will be very scant, and the type and form of government that will be needed then entirely unlike that which may be needed now. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, it was my purpose to have discussed this bill under such circumstances as would have given me an opportunity to have entered into the details of the bill to discover, if I could, whether or not there were any merits in it; but being cut off from that privilege I will occupy a moment in answering, if I can, the question just discussed by the gentleman from Iowa. I have heard it here on this floor before to-day and in former times that we were legislating with reference to the Canal Zone and not with reference to some of our Territories, and that in so doing we were following the precedent of the act that was passed in 1803 purely to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the Louisiana Purchase. That act was passed October 31, 1803, to enable President Jefferson to take possession of the recently acquired Louisiana Purchase under the treaty of Paris of date of April 30, 1803. Now, my distinguished friend from Iowa read a part of section 2 of that act, and it confers no shadow of power on the President of the United States akin to that proposed by this bill. [Applause.] It never was intended to confer on him legislative power of any kind, and then the gentleman asked a question as to who questioned the constitutionality of that proceeding. The answer is, History gives it that Thomas Jefferson did that very thing. He questioned not only that, but he said in a communication that it was necessary, in order that the purchase might be obtained under the Constitution of the United States, that it should be amended to make it legal. [Applause.]

Section 2—I have not time to read it—simply confers, under the act passed October 31, 1803, on the President the right to take possession of the territory recently acquired of France and to allow it to be governed by the same officers under the same laws that it was governed under the Spanish possession. And it was temporary, purely temporary, and it was soon superseded or repealed. This act was passed October 31, 1803. The treaty of Paris bears date April 30, 1803. The next act was passed March 26, 1804, when less than a year had elapsed from the passage of the first act. Difficulties had arisen which hastened the later legislation by Congress. Thomas Jefferson found difficulty in getting possession of even a small part of the great Louisiana Purchase, and an act was passed March 26, 1804, to aid him further in acquiring possession of territory and to enable the laws of the United States to be applied and be made to effectively apply to the government of that territory. The last act—section 4—provided for the appointment of a governor of the territory, conferring upon him pardoning power and the executive power to administer the laws. It provided also for a legislative branch to be organized to make the territorial laws, all of which were required to be submitted to the Congress of the United States before they became effective. And this is the precedent they say is followed in this bill. I quote from section 2 of the bill:

> That, subject to the provisions of this act and until otherwise provided by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers of the United States in the Canal Zone, including the power to make all laws, rules, and regulations necessary for the government of the Canal Zone, and all the rights, powers, and authority granted to the United States by the terms of the treaty described in section 1 of this act shall be vested in the President, etc.

There is nothing of that kind in the laws relating to the government of the Louisiana Purchase, but if the bill stopped there there might be some reason conjured up in the minds of constitutional lawyers. I do not believe in authorizing the President of the United States to make any law that binds the United States, whether it relates to a Territory or anything else. [Applause.]

The Constitution of the United States, paragraph 2, section 3, Article IV, gives exclusive power to Congress to legislate for the Territories. It reads:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories or other property belonging to the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEIFER. Let me read further from where I left off:

> Shall be vested in the President or such person or persons as the President shall, from time to time, designate, detail, or appoint.

Any fellow that he might catch along the canal or anywhere can be authorized under this provision of the bill to make a law for the government of all the people within the Canal Zone that are subject to the control of the Government. These lawmakers, those who are detailed, are not to be appointed by and with the advice of the Senate of the United States. They are to be lawmakers in lieu of the constitutional legislative body of the United States already quoted, and are to be held responsible to nobody.

Is there any precedent for that in the law relating to the Louisiana Purchase? I regret that I could not have discussed this bill in detail some, but I will read the last clause of section 3, keeping in mind this wonderful legislative power given to the President of the United States and any of his appointees, wherever they may be.

It says, and I read from the bill:

> Authority is hereby given for the procurement, use, and maintenance of each and every thing necessary for the complete construction, maintenance, and operation of said canal from deep water to deep water.

When my friend from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, would rise to make a point of order against an appropriation relating to the Panama Canal because it was not authorized by law, the mover would point to this paragraph and say that about everybody under this was authorized to do whatever he pleased, contract any obligation he chose, and involve the Government into whatever he wished, even to the power of changing the plans of building the canal, and all appropriations that were for such things as that would be in pursuance of law.

A word as to the courts. First, as to the jury. I wish my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] would read the provision of the act of March 26, 1804, providing for juries and how they were to be selected, and then see if that is a precedent for saying that every person guilty of felony shall be tried by an "impartial jury," as this bill only says. The Constitution of the United States, paragraph 3 of section 2, Article III, says that "the trial of all crimes, except for impeachment, shall be by jury;" but they have cut the constitutional provision in two and found a class of people only who are entitled under it to trial by jury, and then does not provide how we are to get a jury. But they leave that to be worked out, because they can call Bill Jones or somebody from some place down in the Culebra cut or elsewhere and tell him to make a law on the subject and put it in force and have an impartial jury.

These are only some of the smaller objections I have to this bill. The particular one I can not now discuss, and that is the objection to destroying a great, perfectly working system that is building the canal under the engineers and that will succeed if we do not destroy that commission and institute in place of it that which is utterly and wholly impracticable. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to add my protest to this legislation, no matter where the precedent for it can be found, and I undertake to say that the gentleman from Iowa has not found in the act of 1803 any precedent for legislation of this character. In those early days of the Republic Congress was not as well equipped to discharge its duties as it is now. In those early days of the Republic, when self-government was considered something of an experiment in the western world, when a young nation was feeling its way in the dark, through forests and across rivers toward the western sea, some excuse could be found for delegating temporarily to the Executive authority to govern in a military way a vast and newly acquired territory about which nothing was known.

I remember, however, that for the first fifty years of the life of the Republic one great party maintained a consistent fight against the exactions of the Executive. At the present time the fight seems to be abandoned, and we continue thrusting more and more power upon the President. One hundred and five years ago Members of Congress were not supplied with secretaries. They did not receive the salary and the mileage they receive now. They were not supplied with offices in a palatial building. At the present time they have all these things, and every time this body increases its salary, every time we increase our perquisites, we surrender more and more the functions of this Government to the Executive. This is the most absolute surrender of all. If we continue on our present career, it will not be many years, perhaps about the time Members of this body receive a salary of $10,000 a year, we will have surrendered to the Executive everything. We will then come here and stay with nothing to do except draw our salaries and distribute garden seed. [Applause.] It is time that the Members of this body did something besides clerical work to earn the salaries they receive.

The only excuse for this legislation is that we can not do it; that we do not have time; that Congress can not examine into these conditions; that many men can not do what one man can do; and therefore we shirk these responsibilities and shoulder upon the Executive all these additional powers. [Applause.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I do not know whether the distinguished gentleman from Ohio intended to accuse me of misreading the section of the statute.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, no; you did not read it all.

Mr. HEPBURN. I read it all; every word of the section. Mr. Chairman, I want to correct the gentleman from Ohio's history with reference to the section which I read, on the powers that were conferred. There never was a proposition on the part of Mr. Jefferson or anybody else to grant other authority in a constitutional amendment. The amendment to the Constitution which was sought by Mr. Jefferson, not once but twice, and possibly three times, was to validate his act in the purchase of Louisiana, not his acts in its government. He did not question the authority of Congress to bestow upon him the power that he exercised. And I assert now that there is no substantial difference between conferring the power in the section that it is moved now to strike out of this bill and in section 2 of the act of October 31, 1803. There is a substantial grant in that act of every power that is sought by this bill to vest in the President and the agents that he may select.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HEPBURN. In a moment. Further, Mr. Chairman, in that act that I have read from, of 1803, there is no reference to confirmation by the Senate. Why does the gentleman, in distinguishing between the two acts, comment upon the fact that in the bill we have introduced there is no power granted to the Senate to confirm? The bills are alike in that particular. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KEIFER. What I said was that in this act absolutely there was no legislative power conferred upon the President or anybody else. It says:

All the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same shall be vested in such person and persons and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct for maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of Louisiana in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion.

There is nothing said about creating the courts by the President, but only by carrying out the law by the old officers of old legislation.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I read that. And let me call the attention of the gentleman to the language that he does not seem to understand, although I have read it to him and he has read it himself. [Laughter.] I again read from the act of 1803:

All the military, civil, and judicial powers—

Can you think of any other power?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. The military power, to control the army and navy; the civil power, the power to make laws; the judicial power, to interpret and execute them. That is the power to govern, Mr. Chairman, and the effect was to include all the powers that could be exercised or were necessary for the government.

Mr. KEIFER. There is nothing said about legislative power.

Mr. HEPBURN. There is civil power.

Mr. KEIFER. Civil power does not mean legislative power.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does not that include legislative power?

Mr. KEIFER. "Exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same."

Mr. HEPBURN. All of the officers—the legislative officers, the judicial officers, the military officers; all the officers. I can conceive of no power that was not conferred upon the President of the United States.

What are the probabilities of the purposes of the Congress in this granting of power? Is it to be supposed that they granted a part and withheld a part, that they used this particular language, and yet in their intent there was a reservation of some power not expressed? Is that the way that laws in those days were enacted? I take it not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa has read section 2 of the act of October, 1803, twice, but he has twice emphasized the wrong part of it. That acts reads:

Be it further enacted, That until the expiration of the present session of Congress—

And by the way, I want to say in that connection that after that law expired Mr. Jefferson would have been the last man in the world to have arrogated to himself the power or right to extend it. He never did, and the Democratic Congress was not derelict in the performance of its legislative duty, but did do what it held out to the country the hope that it would do, to wit, constructed a frame of government for the Louisiana territory. But let us go on—unless provision for the temporary government of said Territory be sooner made by Congress—

Now listen to this—

all the military, civil, and judicial power—

What military, civil, and judicial power?

Exercised by the officers of the existing government—

That is the language of the Jefferson Act. What is the language of this act?

All the military, civil, and judicial powers of the United States.

The practical operation of the Jefferson Act was merely to invest in the Executive of the United States the power to carry on the government there as it then existed. Mr. Jefferson never made a law for Louisiana. He never construed a law for Louisiana. The act merely conferred upon the President the power to see to it that the existing government exercised its functions through proper officers, and the power to appoint suitable and loyal men as officeholders to exercise those functions in the Louisiana territory, instead of those then exercising the power, if the President chose.

To read the Jefferson Act further:

All the powers exercised by the officers of the existing government shall be vested—

Where?

In such person or persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct, for maintaining and protecting—

And so forth.

In other words, Louisiana was left under the existing government that had come through French and Spanish rule, and that act conferred upon the President of the United States the power to appoint Americans if he chose, or anybody, to exercise those powers. That is all. The powers were already existent. They were not created by the act, nor was the President empowered by the act to create a government, nor to make laws. The practical operation of the act was merely to give to President Jefferson the power to appoint officeholders in the Louisiana territory. I say again, what is substantially a repetition, that it is almost blasphemous to compare the provisions and intent of this act with the provisions and intent of the act to which I have referred—the so-called "Jefferson Act"—act of October, 1803. That act bore plainly upon its face—coming to the intent now—a mere temporary intent, an intent to prevent anarchy until Congress could act, and, moreover, to prevent anarchy by the maintenance of existing institutions. No wonder, then, that no one called its constitutionality into question.

This act offered here to-day bears upon its face the intent to legislate permanently, or more or less nearly permanently, into existence a condition of autocracy upon the Canal Zone. This act, without any period of limitation fixed in it—indefinite, if not perpetual; perpetual unless repealed—gives to the President of the United States judicial, legislative, and executive power; the power to make and amend laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for a few minutes more.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes, and that debate upon the section may close in ten minutes.

Mr. COCKRAN. Do you mean ten minutes after the gentleman from Mississippi concludes, or do you mean ten minutes including his five?

Mr. MANN. I will say twenty minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the gentleman mean thereby to shut out amendments?

Mr. MANN. It would not shut out amendments. It would shut out debate.

Mr. HARRISON. Debate on the amendments? Then I object.

Mr. MANN. Then I move that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire that motion put now, or after the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. MANN. I will not press that motion; but I should like to call the attention of the House, if I may, just for a second, to this proposition: This bill is up to-day. If it is to be passed at all it is to be passed to-day. We have the time before us, and if gentlemen prefer to spend all the time on this section of the bill it is the privilege of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, the act of October, 1803, vested no power in the President of the United States at all except the power to appoint people to "exercise" the powers of an existent and ascertained government. Here is another very marked difference, and it is in two words, but it is great. The language of the act of 1803 is, after reciting the power:

Shall be vested in—

Whom?—

In the President of the United States or such person or persons.

In such person or persons. That is the language there. The language of this act is:

In the President of the United States or such person or persons,

And hence the President of the United States can sit here in Washington and execute and construe and make laws upon the zone. Why did the gentleman insert those three words, "the President or?"

The whole purpose of the act of 1803 was to enable the President to appoint persons who should exercise the functions of an already prescribed government in the Louisiana territory. The object of this act is to confer upon the President himself and upon others, merely his lieutenants, all of these extensive powers, judicial and legislative. That is not all. The Jefferson Act stops right there with the words the gentleman from Iowa has read and that I have for the most part reread. I will read the balance unread by me, so that you can see there is nothing relevant to this discussion in it:

As the President of the United States shall direct for the maintaining and protecting the inhabitants of Louisiana in the free enjoyment of liberty, property, and religion.

Did that act give President Jefferson power to amend laws?

But at the tail end of this act which we are now considering come these words:

And all orders and regulations with respect to the government of the Canal Zone heretofore enacted by the President or pursuant to his directions or authority are ratified and confirmed, without prejudice to the power to revoke or amend the same.

Not only are we called on to ratify executive usurpation in order to give Mr. Roosevelt a "clean bill of health," but after we are through ratifying it we are to give him additional power to "amend" the very legislation which you yourselves enact in this bill by ratifying it—"subject to the provisions of this bill." What does the bill do? Ratifies the legislation already had by executive pronunciamento. What else does it do? Gives the President power to amend the legislation already had, ratified by the bill and thereafter adopted by Congress.

Mr. Chairman, as far as I am concerned, I have had a great deal of difficulty in making up my mind as to how I would vote on this matter. I admit that the conditions to be created by this bill will be infinitely preferable to the conditions that now exist, but at the same time the conditions to be created by the bill are so absolutely insufferable, intolerable, and, in my opinion, violative of every democratic and constitutional principle that I can not even swallow them as a sweeter dose than the others. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have been trying to make up my mind to stand by friends on the committee whom I know so well, whose love of duty I know so well, and I have been trying to get my consent to vote for the bill as a better measure than the conditions that we have now. But I do not see how I can reconcile my conscience to a breach of my oath to the Constitution in order merely to prevent the President of the United States from indulging in further breaches of his oath to the same instrument. [Applause.]

It seems to me that with this section in this bill I can not vote for it. It does not seem to me that anybody can who wants to walk in the pathway that our people over here and your people over there, for the most part, have blocked out as the American and constitutional pathway for the progress and glory of the American Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] must simplify the question before this committee and facilitate the Members in reaching a right conclusion. As representatives of the people, sworn to defend the Constitution and to vote for the best system of laws attainable, it seems to me his conclusion that the system proposed by this measure is an improvement on the one it is intended to supplant should settle for those of us who agree with him discussion as to the action we must take now, though it may leave a wide field open for speculation as to whether a system still better might not have been submitted to us.

That a better system of government or administration might be devised I think everyone will admit. That a better system ought to have been devised everyone on this side will contend. But that we should defeat a measure which admittedly will vastly improve actual conditions merely because the improvement does not go so far as our own aspirations—does not fully satisfy our conception of what is necessary to make the situation entirely satisfactory—would be, in my humble judgment, little short of disloyalty to our obligations.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COCKRAN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose the improvement involves and holds in itself a breach of fundamental principles and of constitutional law, no matter how bad a thing it is taking the place of?

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I would most respectfully suggest that, according to the gentleman's own statement, we are confronted with two breaches of the Constitution, one actual and exceedingly vicious, the other threatened, but less vicious; and as between a breach of the Constitution that is wholly vicious and one that is less so, I believe we should act so as to keep vice at the minimum, even if we can not reach perfect virtue. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and to my friends on this side that it seems to me much confusion of thought is likely to flow from attempts to consider the measures taken in 1803 for the government of Louisiana as at all analogous to the measure proposed now for the government of the Panama Canal Zone. The two enterprises are wholly different, radically irreconcilable. One can not furnish a precedent for the other. They can not be discussed as kindred subjects. Louisiana was acquired reluctantly, but taken for the express purpose of erecting States from it—a vast territory upon which our experiment of government (for it was then but an experiment) could be tried on a broader scale. Every measure passed with relation to its government was adopted with that end in view.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are not now contemplating the establishment of a government for territory that may some day become a State of this Union, or several States. We are engaged in prescribing conditions under which a great enterprise of improvement and commerce shall be constructed. We are discussing the care of a strip of ground 10 miles wide, taken not for the purpose of political experimentation, but solely for the purpose of constructing a canal. The principles of government applicable to communities with large populations permanently occupying the soil, whose complex interests must be served, whose diverse callings and occupations must be protected and regulated by a system of laws, can have little or no application to an enterprise where the acquisition of a narrow territory is but an incident to a superior purpose, which is the construction of a canal. It is rather the management of a contractor's yard than the establishment of a government for which we are making provision. Sir, this territory was taken against my judgment.

I do not believe the method by which we seized it was creditable to our diplomacy or to our fame. But we have it. No one now contends that we could get rid of it either with honor or advantage. No one believes a proposal to get rid of it would be feasible. It is ours irretrievably and we can not escape the duty to provide for its management and government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman leaves that part of the discussion and goes into what he is now beginning to say so well, and with which I agree with him, does not the gentleman recognize that there is not one problem but that there are two problems; one the construction of a canal, which is purely physical, and the other the government of the people, which is political and social, and that the two ought to be divorced from one another?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to continue for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I concede that to some extent the proposition of the gentleman is entirely correct. There are two aspects to this matter. But the dominant purpose for which this land was taken and for which it is held is not the government of its inhabitants, but the construction of a canal, and it is this dominant purpose that should govern the legislation we are to enact. But even in its political aspect, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] knows full well that of the whole population there are not more than four or five thousand whom he would consider fit to be intrusted with power to exercise control over government. There are thirty-five or forty thousand people there who would be incapable of exercising the suffrage with advantage to themselves or safety to the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then do not qualify the unfit as voters.

Mr. COCKRAN. Well, sir, upon that proposal I am unwilling to admit that I could ever be induced to take part in establishing a government nominally representative where any considerable number of human beings are unfit for a share in controlling it. I might, under certain circumstances, find myself compelled to accept conditions produced by a current of events which I could not control; but I will never deliberately aid in organizing a government nominally constitutional where the essence of it is contempt or distrust of a vast majority of the governed. If we are to organize a government in this territory according to the constitutional principles underlying our own, then, in God's name, let us create representative bodies with universal suffrage and a constitution securing to every inhabitant the right to vote for the officers who will administer it, and the representatives who will frame the laws under which he must live. The gentleman from Mississippi has not, nor have I, nor has this Congress, any God-given right to fasten a government on anyone, however humble we may conceive his intellectual attainments to be, merely because we consider it would be better than he himself could establish. [Applause.] But we must deal with conditions as they are, not as we might wish them to be. There is no population in this Canal Zone capable of maintaining representative institutions.

We must have order and we must arrange some form of government to maintain it. I believe, therefore, we are justified in adopting the measures now pending before us on the ground of imperious necessity.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York has misunderstood the "gentleman from Mississippi." I merely suggested to him in a side remark I made that if there were people upon the zone incapable of voting, not fit to vote as he said there were, they need not be qualified as voters, and the balance of the people being fit and qualified could and would govern the territory. I believe America is about prepared now to say that no man ought to vote who has not at least that degree of intelligence shown by the fact that he can read and write. Of course, I would not have the horde of ignorant and illiterate Jamaican negro laborers, who are after all floating and temporary residents and British subjects to boot, vote.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I am one who most emphatically denies that. I believe there is no safety for this Republic except in absolutely universal suffrage [applause], and I think the experience of this world does not show that it has been the educated and the cultivated always who have been the most virtuous or the most intelligent at the ballot box.

But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to remind the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that he is not proposing by the suggestion embodied in his question to disqualify merely a few persons in this territory—so few that they might be considered a negligible quantity. His proposal is to give the suffrage—that is to say, the control—of government to three or four thousand persons, principally, almost entirely, temporary sojourners there, and allow the remaining thirty-five or forty thousand people to be what? Not the equals of those who are admitted to the suffrage, but the subjects of these four or five thousand. And this small class thus vested with power over their fellows nine or ten times more numerous would not be chosen by the votes of the American people or appointed by an American authority to administer the government placed in their hands. They would not be even sworn to observe any rule of law or justice in the exercise of this enormous power. They would not even be known to any American authority, so that their identity could be fixed or determined.

There is but one method of government applicable to this territory, and that is government by force. If we must have a government by force, then let the force be confided to the highest amongst us. Sir, I hold it necessary under these conditions that when such a government is established by the American people as matter of necessity it should be administered by the highest officer in the American political system. It will not be an ideal system of government, but it is the best form possible under the conditions which confront us. The President may not know more of that people or their necessities than we do. You may say we are as well qualified as he to legislate for that territory. That I will admit. But this bill provides for a commission to exercise local jurisdiction, through which the President can be informed of everything affecting the territory and its inhabitants. His action with reference to these interests would then be based on definite knowledge, and we may presume at least that it would be governed by a conscientious conception of his sworn duty. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to detain the committee but a moment. This is a practical proposition. An academic discussion on government is doubtless interesting and instructive. We are in possession of the Canal Zone. We are constructing a canal. Congress has authorized no form of government there. On one hand the government is chaos, on the other hand at present is an executive government. We can confirm what has been done or we can undertake to enact legislation which has already been enacted, and I hold before you a volume of the laws on the zone, constantly requiring attention, would require the whole session of this Congress, at this rate, to pass and be under consideration every day, constantly requiring amendment. That is one proposition. Can we do it? We all know that it is impracticable. The other proposition would be to set up an elective form of government on the zone. In other words, to have our employees on the zone while there engaged in our work constructing that canal to determine for themselves all about the government on the zone, appoint the judicial officers, who would determine between them and the United States upon the zone. The idea seems to me preposterous. This is but a temporary measure. In 1903 there was a call for a temporary measure. The House responded in the Fifty-eighth Congress by providing a temporary measure governing the Canal Zone. In that same Congress we passed another act almost identical with this act, so far as this House is concerned, without even a division. Now we are called upon to provide there a government under the authority of the Congress, or else an executive government, or else chaos. Which do the gentlemen propose? Will they have the President cease the government there and have chaos while we are constructing the canal? Will they propose to vote against this bill in order to have chaos or in order to have an executive government?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why not amend this bill now so as to give them government there?

Mr. MANN. Well, if the gentleman from Mississippi had listened to my remarks he would have heard what I said about that. There is no proposition, and there can be none, for a temporary government of the zone elected by the employees of the Government there which will be successful. We can provide that government by the enactment of laws, if we have knowledge enough, but we have not for lack of time. Here is a proposition for the construction of a great work. The men in charge of that work have charge of the employees. It is provided by the Government that the sanitation of the Isthmus shall not be left to the people who are there to determine; that the colored men from Jamaica shall not determine for themselves whether they shall keep clean or keep out yellow fever; that the men who go from the States down there shall not determine what measures of sanitation shall be taken upon this zone. These gentlemen opposing the bill would give to the employees all this control; but if they do it before the canal is completed, they will be driven out by the fever, by ill health, by sickness, and death, as the French people were driven out. It needs autocratic methods to finish the canal with safety to the Government and safety to the people of the United States engaged upon it. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to discuss the question. I will make the motion to strike out the last five words, if necessary. I did not understand debate was limited.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask unanimous consent to close debate in five minutes, and I will yield that time to the gentleman?

Mr. KEIFER. I certainly will, but I do not want to shut off anybody else who desires to speak.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon the section and amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HARRISON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes 71.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to perfect the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. HARRISON. Does not this amendment take precedence? A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has offered an amendment himself, which is in order, and the Chair recognizes him for five minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. I will occupy these five minutes as closely as possible. Wherever I can agree with Members I am going to do it. I can not agree with the distinguished Member from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in charge of the bill, that we ought to violate every principle of government and the Constitution of the United States because there is danger of chaos down on this Canal Zone of 10 miles in width and about 50 miles in length. I was down there with him once, and I went with other Members at another time, and we had no chaos, and we had no trouble. We were all protected and came home safely. The chaos of that time was as great as it is to-day, and we have had five years of that sort of chaos that is to scare us to pass this bad bill for a more permanent government.

I agreed with the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] when he said he believed in universal suffrage, giving all an equal representation and power politically in this Government. But I do not believe, with him, that because we have got a small territory down there that we should legislate without reference to the Constitution or fundamental principles. Otherwise we might say, "Pick up little Delaware, or little Rhode Island, violate the Constitution and wipe them out of existence." But I must pass on and come to others.

I did not, Mr. Chairman, mean to have it understood that I said the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] had misquoted section 2 of the act of October 31, 1803. I did say that I understood he claimed, after having read substantially all of it, or all of it, that it was exactly like an utterly dissimilar part of this bill which I read a few minutes ago. He says that I should be corrected in history with reference to Thomas Jefferson's position in regard to the acquisition of the Louisiana Purchase.

I have not time to go to the books, but Mr. Jefferson, in his own language, stated that his objection to the acquiring of territory was constitutional; but he was willing practically to violate it and take possession under the power of Congress, which he denied under the Constitution absolutely, and asked that an amendment to the Constitution should be adopted for the purpose of making legal what he did when he bought the Louisiana country—more in area than the United States owned prior to that time—of the great Napoleon I, in violation of an existing treaty to return it to Spain.

Jefferson knew all these things; but we wanted the Louisiana country, and we have gotten it. That was the extent of Mr. Jefferson's position. The act of March 26, 1804, that I have referred to before, was a temporary act also, but it provided for a legislative body until they could do certain things and make permanent new laws and by extending the laws, as they did, of the Territory of Indiana over the Territory of Louisiana, covering the whole of the Louisiana Purchase. And that law extended the other and earlier one, the act of 1803, to the end of a session, and only made the act of 1804 extend to the end of that same session of Congress, and it also was purely temporary in character.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HAYES, of California, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 89.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made an examination and survey, with the view to establishing a harbor at New River, Fla., where same has been connected to the Atlantic Ocean by cut-off, and to report, together with estimates of the cost of the project, securing over the bar at that location at least 20 feet of water and the construction of jetties to protect the same.

Senate concurrent resolution 88.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary survey to be made of Cheboygan River, Cheboygan County, Mich., for the purpose of widening its channel and rebuilding or repairing the locks in said river as will render the river navigable to boats drawing 8 feet of water, and to furnish an estimate of the cost of such improvement.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 7808. An act to provide for the distribution of the reports of the United States circuit courts of appeals and of the United States circuit and district courts to certain officers of the United States, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 27252. An act for the relief of Francisco Krebs and his heirs and assigns; and

H. R. 13809. An act for the relief of Charles S. Blood.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 25392) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. ELKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 6359) to change the name and jurisdiction of the inferior court of justice of the peace in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 8540) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River in Marion County, Tenn.," approved May 20, 1902, as amended by an act approved February 1, 1905, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River in Marion County, Tenn.'"

GOVERNMENT OF THE CANAL ZONE, ETC.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment for the perfecting of a paragraph. It has parliamentary preference over an amendment to strike out.

After the word "and," line 17, page 2, insert the words "until March 4, 1911, or," so that it will read:

Subject to the provisions of this act and until March 4, 1911, or until otherwise provided by law.

So that it may appear upon the face of the act that it is temporary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 17, after the word "and" at the end of the line, insert "until March 4, 1911, or," so that it will read:
"That, subject to the provisions of this act and until March 4, 1911, or until otherwise provided by Congress," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes 85.

Mr. MANN. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 96.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment for the purpose of perfecting the text, by striking out, in line 20, page 2, the word "laws" and the comma and inserting in lieu thereof the word "necessary."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, strike out the word "laws" and the comma and insert the word "necessary," so as to read: "Make all necessary rules," etc.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 66, noes 97.

Mr. HARDWICK. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will take their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 110.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the President, through one of the executive departments of the Government, to be designated by him, or otherwise in his discretion, shall cause to be excavated and completed the Panama Canal; and he is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one director and one chief engineer of the Panama Canal, and one governor of the Canal Zone, and from time to time to fix their compensation, duties, powers, and relative jurisdiction until such time as Congress may by law otherwise provide, and the same person may be appointed to any two of such offices; and the President may remove any of said officials at his pleasure. And the President is further authorized for the purposes described in this act to detail, appoint, and employ, or provide for the appointment or employment of such persons with such duties, powers, jurisdiction, and official designations as may from time to time be deemed necessary, and to dismiss or provide for the dismissal of the same; and the compensation of such persons shall be fixed by the President, or by his authority, until such time as Congress may by appropriation act or other law regulate the same. Any of the persons appointed or employed as aforesaid may be persons in the military or civil service of the United States, but the amount of the official salary paid to any such person shall be deducted from the amount of salary or compensation provided by or which shall be fixed under the terms of this act. Authority is hereby given for the procurement, use, and maintenance of each and everything necessary for the complete construction, maintenance, and operation of said canal from deep water to deep water.

Mr. RAINEY. I offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "to" and before the word "detail," in line 23, page 3, the following: "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. COCKRAN. I would like to have that amendment repeated.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. RAINEY. This amendment, Mr. Chairman, only removes a part of the evils in this section. Under the section just read the President of the United States can appoint a director, a chief engineer of the Panama Canal Zone, and a governor of the zone, but he can only do it by and with the advice of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the gentleman proceeds I want to call his attention to the manner in which his amendment would come in. I think the gentleman merely wishes to provide that when appointments are made that they shall be by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The way you have got it, by inserting it between the words "to" and "detail," it would read:

The President is further authorized for the purposes described in this act to, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, detail, appoint, etc.

If your amendment passed, the President could not detail an army officer except by the advice and consent of the Senate, nor a civil engineer without the consent and advice of the Senate. But if you put it after the word "appoint" it would read "appoint by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," etc.

Mr. RAINEY. I think the criticism is well made, and I change that amendment, Mr. Chairman, so as to come in after the word "appoint."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as so changed.

Mr. RAINEY. This section contains some astonishing provisions. In addition to giving the President the right to appoint these three principal officials it gives him the right to give to any one man two of these offices so created.

The fixing of the amount of the salary rests entirely in the discretion of the President. It looks to me as if this particular clause in this bill was framed up for the purpose of giving a job to an ex-President of the United States after he comes back from shooting at lions in Africa. The section continues here and authorizes the President to create just as many offices as he wants to create, to fill them himself, and to prescribe the duties of these various positions, the titles of the officers, and to fix the amount of the salaries himself, without the consent of anybody. It absolutely abrogates the civil service as it might be applied to the zone. The President sent back here not long ago, with his veto, the census bill, which gave to Members of Congress the right to select some employees over here in the Bureau of Census when the time comes to take the next census, and he sent it back here because selections could be made without any sort of examination and without any reference to the civil-service laws.

This clause authorizes the President of the United States, without the consent of the Senate, to create as many offices as he pleases, to fill them with whom he pleases, and to fix salaries to suit himself. I submit that if this amendment goes through, and it is required that the appointments when made from civilians shall be with the advice and consent of the Senate, it will be something of a check on his powers in this particular. This amendment, in view of the recent veto message of the President, ought to receive the support of both sides of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. RAINEY) there were—ayes 45, noes 87.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting immediately after the word "authorized," in line 14, page 3, the following: "To designate from the Corps of Engineers of the Army one director and one chief engineer of the Panama Canal, and;" and by striking out of lines 14 and 15, same page, the words "one director and one chief engineer of the Panama Canal."

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment, if adopted, would be to have the director and the chief engineer taken by the President from the Engineer Corps of the Army and the governor appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Everybody who has given any attention to the condition of affairs down in Panama is aware that since the work was put in charge of army engineers it has progressed very much more satisfactorily than it did before. I presume it is not the purpose to change the plan of operations down there by putting the army engineers out of charge and again putting civilians in charge. I suppose it is not the purpose in this legislation in any way to reflect upon the conduct of affairs down there under the supervision of the army engineers.

Now, if these assumptions are correct, it seems to me that the amendment ought to be adopted, because then, instead of being a reflection or an implied reflection upon the engineers who have conducted this work with very great success, it would be in the nature of a commendation of them. The President then would be authorized to designate from this Engineer Corps of the Army the one officer whom he should choose for director and the one officer whom he shall choose for chief engineer of the Panama Canal. Then he would have the same authority precisely as this bill gives, to appoint a governor, in his discretion, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate.

I think that the amendment is one that ought to be adopted. I think that not to adopt it, or something equivalent to it, would be to carry with this enactment, if it becomes a law, a suggestion that there is a design to change from the control of affairs by the engineers of the army to control again by civilians, which was certainly very unsatisfactory, as we all know.

It carries with it, I think, as it stands now (and I feel confident that that was not designed) a reflection upon the conduct of affairs down there by the army engineers. There ought to be no such reflection, actual or implied, real or supposed, because the officers in charge deserve commendation and not censure, direct or indirect. I hope that the amendment will be adopted, and I hope that there will be no opposition to its adoption.

Mr. MANN. I deny that this bill carries any reflection upon the present engineers down there in any way whatever.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would say, and I think I did say, that I am sure there is no such intention as that, but I believe that the bill would be subject to that interpretation.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to state that that was his opinion, and now rise to give mine, so that there can be no misunderstanding as to our position on the matter. There is no such intention; far from it. The report in this case takes special occasion to pay a tribute to Colonel Goethals, the engineer down there. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is he designing to open the way for the appointment of a civilian to manage this canal work?

Mr. MANN. That way is open now. It is not designed to open or to close the way. I have no doubt that the work will continue to be administered by Colonel Goethals as long as he is willing to accupy his position, which I hope will be until after the canal is completed. But if for any reason the office should become vacant, the President ought to be permitted to select the best man he can get for the place. Probably that might be from the army engineers; but I do not believe he ought to be compelled to take a man from the army engineers, unless in his judgment the best man for the work is to be found in that corps.

Mr. DE ARMOND. What is the occasion for having the concurrence of the Senate in the designation of an army engineer for that position?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, a moment ago a gentleman on that side offered an amendment under which you could not detail an army officer down there for any purpose——

Mr. DE ARMOND. I did not offer it.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman did not—without the concurrence of the Senate. If I had my way about it, I would never provide any office that I could constitutionally and require the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think this is true about it: The army officer is already, of course, in the employ of the Government. He discharges all of his duties in the regular way, by designation of his commanding officer. Now, when it is required that there be such designation by consent of the Senate, there certainly is carried with it, whatever the intention may be, and I understand the intention is as the gentleman states——

Mr. MANN. I want to say to the gentleman that the officer has been confirmed by the Senate. General Goethals was appointed and confirmed by the Senate, as the gentleman will remember. I would not do anything that reflected on General Goethals. I think he is the greatest engineer in the world, and it is to strengthen his hand that we have this bill in this shape.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think it would be better with the amendment adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "compensation," line 17, page 3, the following words: "not to exceed $10,000 per annum."

Mr. DE ARMOND. Now, Mr. Chairman, a single word in regard to that. It seems to me there can be no reason why the House should not express its judgment as to what the compensation of the officers and employees should be, or at least fix a limit. I think $10,000 would be a reasonable limit; if it is not, then some other limit ought to be fixed, no matter what it may be, up or down, but it appears to me good legislation and proper procedure not to clothe the President with the power of fixing compensation as he chooses and pleases. That is all that I wish to say about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting between the words "person" and "shall," line 3, page 4, the following:
"Not to exceed $10,000 per annum for any one of them."

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, that applies to what would be supposed to be the inferior officers selected by the President. What I have stated about the other amendment applies with greater force to this. That is all I care to say on the subject.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after line 14, page 4, the following:
"Provided, That the employment of skilled laborers, clerks, and others who have heretofore been known as gold employees shall be restricted to American citizens."

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, if we are to enter upon the gigantic system of spoils contemplated here in this bill, I prefer that the spoils shall go to American citizens. I am informed that this afternoon on the floor of the Senate the chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the gentleman that it is not proper to state anything that occurred on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. RAINEY. Very well, Mr. Chairman; then I will not do it. I understand it has been stated this afternoon by a gentleman in authority, who has the means at his disposal of arriving at correct conclusions, that it will cost $417,000,000 to build even this lock type of canal. Much of that money goes to employees who are on the gold rolls. Now, if the President of the United States is to create down there as many officers as he pleases and pay each one of those officers so appointed as large a salary as he pleases, then I prefer that these officers so appointed, and sharing in the moneys and spoils connected with this canal, shall at least be American citizens, even though they belong to the other party.

The so-called "gold roll" on the Isthmus of Panama takes in all those employees who are above the grade of mere laborers. Men getting $80 a month and more than that, up, perhaps, to $200 or $300 a month and more, are paid in gold, and therefore are known as "gold employees."

Within the last thirty days, by executive order, the President has put into effect on the Canal Zone an order providing that the gold employees may be selected not only from American citizens, but also from citizens of the Republic of Panama. If we are to create all these hundreds of offices and pay to the men appointed to fill them millions of dollars, I insist that, as a part of the organic law under which these appointments are made, every one of them should be an American citizen. You gentlemen on the other side who are supporting the President of the United States, who are voting here with the committee and for this particular clause which creates spoils unprecedented in the history of the Nation, if you want to be true to your own party, if you want to keep these offices within your own party, if you want to be able to go home and explain things to your constituents who are demanding places down there on the gold rolls of the Canal Zone, you will vote for this amendment; and if you do not vote for it, we will see to it that in the congressional campaign next year your constituents know that you did not. Now, vote as you please. [Laughter on Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAINEY) there were—ayes 58, noes 84.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5, page 4, strike out the words "appropriation act or other."

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the country to the fact, and if I am mistaken about it some gentleman on the other side can correct me now, and you are nearly all there, that not a single man on the Republican side of this House voted for the amendment which I just offered. Now, if any of you did, I wait to hear the answer, whether you did or not. [Loud cries of "No!" and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I have made the record that I want to make. I insist that if we are to legislate for the Canal Zone we should do it in a regular way and not by means of appropriation acts, and this amendment merely strikes out words which provide that in an appropriation act we can legislate for the Canal Zone.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the provision which the gentleman seeks to strike out is one which saves to Congress the authority to fix salaries at any time in the appropriation act, and is restrictive and not an extension of authority. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That from and after such time as the President may designate the powers and authority heretofore conferred upon the Isthmian Canal Commission shall be exercised by such persons as may be detailed, appointed, or designated by the President in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, with the view of clearing up the statement made by my friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Not only he but several others seem to take the view, or want the country to take the view, that there are but two alternatives before this Congress—either to pass this act with section 2 in it, or to have chaos on the Canal Zone.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not misquote me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the gentleman to say that we had to do this or to have chaos.

Mr. MANN. I said one of three alternatives.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. I recognize now, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman is correct. He said that there were three alternatives—to pass this act with section 2 in it, or to consent to the continuance of affairs as they are now upon the zone, or to have chaos. I say, Mr. Chairman, that there are five alternatives, three of them bad and two of them good. One is chaos, the second is a continuation of the present system down there, which is an executive usurpation; the third is the passage of this act with section 2 in it, giving to the Executive legislative and judicial power. The other two are good alternatives—the fourth, to give a local government down there of some sort, and the fifth to govern the Canal Zone under general laws passed by Congress, with commissions or officials selected by the President, as we govern the District of Columbia.

So that there are five alternatives and not three, and there is no necessity, either, for the continuance of the present executive usurpation or for chaos if Congress wants to do its duty and proceed now to draw up a bill of some sort suitable for the government of the canal.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the judicial power in the Canal Zone shall be vested in one circuit court and such inferior courts as the President may constitute. The judge of the circuit court shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; but in the event of the absence or incapacity of the judge so appointed, a judge pro tempore may be appointed by the governor of the Canal Zone. The records of existing circuit courts and all causes and proceedings pending therein shall be transferred to the jurisdiction of the circuit court hereby created as of the date when the judge appointed hereunder qualifies.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 23, page 4, after the word "court," insert "and inferior judges."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is agreed to it will mean that the inferior judges, all judges appointed for the Canal Zone, shall be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want the justices of the peace on the Canal Zone appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. WEBB. In answer to that I will say that the Constitution provides for only two kinds of judges; that is, the Supreme Court judges and a judge of an inferior court. A justice of the peace is not a court.

Mr. MANN. But these are not constitutional judges. The Canal Zone is not under the jurisdiction of the Constitution.

Mr. WEBB. Then how are we acting? Without constitutional warrant?

Mr. COCKRAN. I suggest probably as a club. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEBB. My friend suggested that we are acting down there as a club. I think that we are acting under the Constitution to some extent. Every judge appointed on the Canal Zone——

Mr. MANN. We even have a tariff law between the Canal Zone and the United States, passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. WEBB. That does not answer my proposition, Mr. Chairman, at all. If there are any district courts to be established down there, the judges of them should be confirmed by the Senate, as well as circuit court judges. The United States circuit court judges are confirmed by the Senate, as well as other inferior federal judges. If the President is going to appoint two or three district judges, they ought to be confirmed by the Senate. I may say further that under the Constitution he has no power to appoint justices of the peace in the Canal Zone. Section 1 of Article III of the Constitution provides that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in the Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time establish, and not by the President. This bill gives the President the right to establish or constitute a court. The Constitution says that the Congress shall establish the courts, and the President, therefore, can not do it.

Now, if this section of the bill refers to the inferior courts mentioned in the Constitution, those are constitutional courts and the appointments of the judges ought to be confirmed by the Senate, and that is all that my amendment provides. The President has no authority under our Constitution to appoint any but judges mentioned in that instrument; and when they are so appointed, they hold their positions as such judges and ought to be confirmed by the Senate, as all federal judges are now confirmed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer and make a few brief remarks, and I do not want to be cut off——

Mr. MANN. Suppose I make it fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in fifteen minutes.

Mr. MARTIN. I understand that this is not all to be taken up by this present amendment.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak to the gentleman's amendment. I believe I am entitled to recognition in opposition to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Albama is right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with my friend from North Carolina with reference to this question. I do not agree, and I believe it is a mistake that the words should remain in the paragraph that the President shall have the right to appoint these judges, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Now, I agree with the gentleman from North Carolina that in all probability the use of the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate" will make this judge a constitutional judge with the power to hold his office for life. I think that would be very unwise, especially at this particular point of territory of the United States. It is well recognized that in the Territories, and I presume in the colonies as well, we can appoint judges who shall not hold a life tenure of office. I believe all the judges in the present Territories hold office of a fixed tenure and not for a life tenure. Now, the reason why I think it is unwise for us to take the chance of appointing judges with a life tenure to office in this particular zone, when we do not have to do so, is this——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Right there, before the gentleman leaves that point. The gentleman is right in saying we have two sorts of judges in the country. We have regular United States judges, who have been appointed for life, and we have territorial judges, but the territorial judges are also, are they not, appointed, by and with the consent of the Senate, no matter what the term is?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think they are, but I think in the Territories at the present time that we only have territorial judges and not district and circuit court judges, except there is an appeal to the circuit court of appeals. My objection to a federal judge being appointed for life to the Canal Zone is that, if there is any possibility of one holding for that length of time, whenever we engage in a war with a foreign country the keystone of the arch of our defense will be the Canal Zone. It will be an important point; it will be a point at which the enemy fires its first shot; it will be a point that we have to maintain under any and all circumstances in order that we can utilize the full power of our fleets. Now, we should not forget that there was a time in the history of the United States when the city of New Orleans was jeopardized, when the British force was about to attack that city, by the federal judge issuing an injunction against General Jackson and attempting to tie his hands and hamper him in using the authority of a general of the United States Army.

Now, if we appoint judges in this territory who hold for life, who are not subject to removal by the President of the United States, we may hereafter find that we are facing conditions that will hamper not only the Government in that territory, but the handling of the armies and the navies of the United States in time of war. As it is not necessary to appoint a judge for life, I think it would be very wise to select the judges for that particular territory who can be removed at the discretion of the President of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 5, page 4, by striking out, in line 22, the words "may constitute" and insert the words "has constituted or may hereafter constitute."

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, when the committee was considering this bill under general debate attention was called by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] and myself to what seems to me to be an unfortunate provision in the bill. I think there would be great confusion as to whether the inferior courts now existing in the Canal Zone continue, and if they do not continue, what becomes of the cases pending therein in case the Congress shall adopt this section in its present form? It is true that the latter clause in section 2 of the bill approves of all acts of the President, and this is undoubtedly an approval of the constitution of such courts, circuit and inferior, as have been constituted in the zone. But section 5 disposes of the entire judicial jurisdiction and power upon the zone, which is, I think, exclusive of the other provisions so far as the judiciary question is concerned. This very section which I propose to amend vests the entire judicial power upon the zone, first, in a circuit court, and then in such inferior courts as the President may constitute, plainly looking to the future and not to the past.

It is very clear to my mind that the effect of that would be to dissolve from the time of the approval of this act any of the inferior courts of the Canal Zone. If that is to be done, then this section should be amended later on to provide for the transfer of the causes pending in these inferior courts to such inferior courts as may be constituted in the future by the President. If, on the other hand, it is the purpose of the committee, which it appears to be from the general language of this bill, that the present inferior courts shall continue and shall continue to have their jurisdiction, then I think the amendment which I propose is absolutely necessary. That would approve of the continuance of the present inferior courts and for the adoption of such others as the President might hereafter constitute. Certainly, if we adopt it in its present form, it appears clear that we, by so doing, limit the entire jurisdiction for judicial purposes upon the Canal Zone to the new courts, first to the circuit court, which is proposed to take the place of the present circuit court, and then to such inferior courts as may be hereafter constituted, and continue with the jurisdiction now employed and exercised by the present courts. I can see no objection to the adoption of this amendment if the purpose of the bill, as intimated by the member of the committee in charge of it, is to continue these inferior courts. If this is not done by this amendment, it does seem to me that the effect would be to leave numerous cases now pending in those inferior courts up in the atmosphere, without any transfer or disposition of their causes, possibly to the loss of the rights of litigants interested in them.

Mr. PARKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] oppose the amendment?

Mr. PARKER. I shall oppose the amendment because I expect to make a motion to strike out the clause, and I desire to say here that it ought to be stricken out.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order as to whether a motion to strike out the entire paragraph is germane or whether the debate on the amendment I offered is alone in order at this time.

Mr. PARKER. Can I have five minutes on the motion to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] asks unanimous consent that he may speak for five minutes upon a motion which he proposes to make later to strike out the section.

Mr. PARKER. I desire to inform the House——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if consent can not be given, I can inform the gentleman that he will have the time.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota ought not to prevail for this reason: The law creating the court is the law of the Isthmian Canal Commission, by authority of the President, and to put in the language of the gentleman would only make it involved and not accomplish the purpose he seeks.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PARKER. I desire to strike out the section and to be heard on that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment to perfect the text, which is entitled to precedence over the motion to strike out. The Chair desires to state that there are only five minutes for debate remaining.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Mr. Chairman, I offer to amend by adding two sections to the bill, to be numbered 6 and 7, and the other sections to be numbered in accordance therewith.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair observes that the amendment sent to the Clerk's desk by the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not appear to be an amendment to the pending paragraph. It therefore is not in order now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to offer an amendment to perfect the section.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a preferential amendment, and takes precedence of the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move to amend the section by adding, after the word "Senate," on line 24, the words "who shall be subject to removal at any time by the President of the United States." I stated a while ago why I think these words should be added, and as the gentleman from New Jersey desires the balance of the time to make a speech in, I will not take up the time, but ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Senate," page 4, line 24, insert the words "who shall be subject to removal at any time by the President of the United States."

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 10.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to perfect the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, line 5, at the end of the line, add "and such causes, cases, and proceedings continued therein."

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, it is simply a continuation of the cases as well as a transfer of the records.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Now the gentleman from New Jersey moves to strike out the section. The gentleman is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I should have liked to have had five minutes. There are three judges now on the Canal Zone. They are called the circuit court. One sits at Ancon, another at Empire, and the other place I have forgotten. Each one holds a circuit court, and they sit together as a united supreme court, where the two who did not try the cause below determine cases on appeal. This supreme court hears appeals right there in the zone and determines them. It is true that the court has not enough business for three judges. But the reason is that there are too many inferior courts—inferior courts of district judges, who can impose a sentence of thirty days' imprisonment and a fine of $100. If the three circuit judges tried all the cases, there would be plenty to do. But I object to the system in this bill, where there will be but one circuit judge, who tries all cases and has absolute power as one judge, without any appeal, in the zone, and that it is proposed either that parties shall wait for a year in order to get two judges down from the circuit court of appeals of New Orleans in order to try the appeal there or else that they shall take the appeal over to New Orleans. We remember that the Revolution was caused very largely because appeals had to be taken over to England from our colonies. Provision is rightly made in section 7 that there shall be a certiorari or appeal in capital cases and cases of great importance to the Supreme Court of the United States.

We have in the second section provided already that the judicial power on the Isthmus shall be vested in such persons as the President may from time to time designate and determine. That can be better designated by him from time to time as the exigencies require by continuing the present circuit court and getting rid of the useless district court, allowing appeals to be there determined, in their own court, and allowing only a certiorari to the Supreme Court of the United States.

I believe in independent local free government, not in one single judge in the zone as the whole judicial government, with only an appeal to a distant court in New Orleans, unless they wait for a year for a hearing. That is all I wish to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NICHOLLS] has a similar amendment pending, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 5, page 5, insert two new sections to stand as sections 6 and 7, as follows:

"SEC. 6. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any of said courts, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and an employee, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed to labor and persons seeking employment as laborers, or between persons seeking employment as laborers, or involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be particularly described in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his, her, or its agent or attorney. And for the purposes of this act no right to continue the relation of employer and employee or to assume or create such relation with any particular person or persons, or at all, or to carry on business of any particular kind, or at any particular place, or at all, shall be construed, held, considered, or treated as property or as constituting a property right.

"SEC. 7. That in cases arising in or coming before said courts, or before any judge or the judges thereof, no agreement between two or more persons concerning the terms or conditions of employment of labor, or the assumption or creation or termination of any relation between employer and employee, or concerning any act or thing to be done or not to be done with reference to or involving or growing out of a labor dispute, shall constitute a conspiracy or other criminal offense or be punished or prosecuted as such unless the act or thing agreed to be done or not to be done would be unlawful if done by a single individual, nor shall the entering into or the carrying out of any such agreement be restrained or enjoined unless such act or thing agreed to be done would be subject to be restrained or enjoined under the provisions, limitations, and definition contained in the foregoing section."

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to any provision of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds that the bill provides for the creation and constitution of courts; the amendment appears, from a hasty reading, to describe, define, or limit the functions and powers of these courts which the bill itself creates. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is germane, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment at this time because I believe it ought to be enacted for the purpose of protecting the rights of certain citizens of this country, which rights are not now protected and cared for according to the practice indulged in by many of the courts, and because I believe also it ought to be a part of the laws governing the whole of the United States.

I realize that this amendment can affect only those who come under the jurisdiction of the courts in the Canal Zone, but I believe that action upon it by this body at this time will indicate what the membership of this House think as to the principle of this anti-injunction legislation.

The President has said in several of his messages, and I remember distinctly in the last message, that abuses in the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes continue to occur. He has recommended that this House take up the question and pass upon it, and enact some legislation so as to prevent the recurrence of those abuses in the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes. The House has not yet taken any action whatsoever. The Committee on the Judiciary have not yet seen fit to report any kind of a measure whatsoever. A then member of the committee was reported last winter as saying in public addresses that their committee would not report this legislation, and substantially said that they feared it would pass the House almost unanimously if opportunity were given the House to pass upon it.

It has thus far been impossible to get such a measure before this House for consideration, and that is one of the reasons, aside from the main point in this amendment, why I bring the matter up at this time. If we are opposed to such legislation, let us say so, but let us not continue to allow a committee of a few Members, or a subcommittee of a very few Members, to prevent consideration on such an important matter by this House.

Some argument has been made against a part of the amendment which I have offered, when it has been discussed in the committee room, on another bill, on the ground that it is designed to take away certain property rights now enjoyed; but I want to make the point that the clause says substantially that those things shall not be considered property rights for the purposes of this measure, and only for this measure. The rights mentioned therein are the rights of the employer to employ, and the right of those whom he may possibly secure as employees to refuse to be employed or to accept employment; the rights of people whom the business man may seek as patrons; the principle being that he has no right to their patronage until it has been granted. I think the rights of the laboring men who may become involved in such a dispute are entitled to be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I hate to object, but I will ask the gentleman if two minutes will be sufficient.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HASKINS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey desire to address the committee in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Would it be in order to move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania have five minutes to conclude his remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not; it requires unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I addressed the Chair some time ago, and the Chair started to address me and various gentlemen interrupted, and I now rise for the purpose of speaking to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asked the gentleman from New Jersey if he desired to address the committee in opposition to the amendment, and the gentleman did not reply, but took his seat.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I desire to speak in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done now only by unanimous consent.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Nobody has made the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I moved to close debate on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that all debate on this paragraph and pending amendment be now closed.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES and Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey) there were 90 ayes and 54 noes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey and Mr. MANN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 97 ayes and 51 noes.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Cox of Indiana) there were 29 ayes and 87 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment in the nature of a new section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. No court or judge in the Canal Zone shall have or exercise jurisdiction in naturalization proceedings.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, the explanation of that is brief. Under the immigration act of 1907, for obvious reasons, we admit people to the Canal Zone whom we do not admit to enter any portion of the United States. It may be that the danger of naturalizing these men is remote.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman understand that it is thoroughly settled that the naturalization laws do not apply to the Canal Zone?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes; under section 33 of the naturalization act.

Mr. MANN. Then what is the use of putting in a provision of this kind?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The immigration laws do not extend to the Canal Zone, but men are admitted to the Canal Zone that are not admitted to the United States. Once there and the courts having the right to naturalize them, a naturalization law being extended to the Canal Zone, the men might be naturalized.

Mr. MANN. Nobody would argue for a moment that a court in the Canal Zone could naturalize anyone so as to to make him an American citizen. You might as well say that a thousand other things should be prohibited in this bill.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The President could extend the power to the court there or to a judge to naturalize as soon as this became law.

Mr. MANN. Not a bit of it; not at all.

Mr. BENNET of New York. No question about it.

Mr. MANN. You might as well put a thousand prohibitions into this bill.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I think it is necessary because of the immigration statute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That in all criminal prosecutions in the Canal Zone for felonies the accused shall enjoy the right of trial by an impartial jury.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Illinois who has the bill in charge to explain this section. Here is the difficulty, as it appears to me, and if the gentleman will explain it, no doubt it will be of benefit to others who, like myself, do not understand it. First, why is the word "impartial" used before the word "jury?" Is there any particular meaning in that word, and would not the section mean just the same if the word "impartial" was left out?

Mr. MANN. I think it would. I say to the gentleman frankly that that is the language of the executive order providing for jury trial on the zone, and we simply followed that language.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Does the gentleman say the word is wholly unnecessary?

Mr. MANN. It declares the intention of Congress that the jury shall be impartial.

Mr. WEBB. I will say to the gentleman that that is the language of the Constitution also.

Mr. BRODHEAD. What is the number of men composing this jury?

Mr. MANN. I take it that it would be a jury of 12.

Mr. BRODHEAD. The gentleman says he takes it that there would be 12. Why could it not be 6?

Mr. MANN. I may say to the gentleman that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is entitled to the credit for having this provision in the bill. He has given a great deal of attention to the subject. We went over and examined it very carefully, intending to provide that there must be a jury trial, if the accused demanded it.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Is there any authority which now fixes the number of this jury at 12.

Mr. MANN. The order now provides for a jury of 12.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Does the gentleman mean the order of the President?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Then, if the President has the right to order a jury of 12, has he not the right to order a jury of 6?

Mr. MANN. I presume he would have.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Can the number of this jury be changed from time to time as it may strike the President's fancy?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it can be or not. I hope it can be. My hope would be that it could be.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I understand that the number of this jury is supposed to be 12, that it is supposed to stay at 12. I understand from the gentleman that this number may be changed from time to time as it may strike the President's fancy. With that view, I offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. I would prefer to take the opinion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], although personally I think that a jury of 6 in many cases down there would be just as sufficient as a jury of 12.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Can the gentleman inform the House how that jury is selected and who is going to compose the jury? Will the jury be composed of white men exclusively?

Mr. MANN. I may say to the gentleman that the jury is now selected, and I suppose will continue to be, by a jury commission, who select American white citizens to act as jurors.

Mr. BRODHEAD. And that is under the President's order?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BRODHEAD. And may be changed at any time?

Mr. MANN. Yes; it might be changed at any time. The gentleman perhaps wants to let anybody select the jury down there, and select some of the colored people? I have no doubt that is his amendment.

Mr. BRODHEAD. No. I do not understand what the gentleman means.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I have an amendment to offer to this section, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 6, page 5, line 8, after the word "jury," by striking out the period and adding the words "of twelve."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia for five minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy the full five minutes. I desire simply to say this: That the President did, some time in February of this year, issue an executive order by which he directed that parties charged with capital offenses should be tried by a jury to be selected by commissioners, to be appointed by the chairman of the Isthmian Canal Commission; that these jury commissioners should select sixty names, and these should constitute the jurors from whom juries should be selected; they were not confined to American citizens in making selection, nor to white nor to black people; but the order prescribed that they should have three months' residence upon the Isthmus, and should be able to read and write the English language. Now, it is true that in carrying out that order there have been none but white people who have been selected as jurors to try any cases. This section of this bill, which extends the right of trial by jury to include not only capital cases, but every case which was denominated a felony by the laws now in force on the zone, was engrafted on the bill upon my suggestion and earnest advocacy. It secures a right which should be preserved to the citizen wherever the flag of our country floats.

Referring, Mr. Chairman, to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRODHEAD], I do not mean to say, when I oppose that amendment, that I am in favor of a jury of less than 12. I am not, and I would resist any effort to make a jury in a criminal case consist of less than 12, but the Supreme Court of the United States, in construing this section of the Constitution, which provides for a trial by an impartial jury, have in a number of cases held that that provision of the Constitution means an impartial jury of 12 men; that the jury trial, as contemplated by the adoption of the Constitution, meant a jury trial as was in existence in England at the time of the adoption of the Constitution; and that court has gone further than that and has held that a jury trial as provided by this section of the Constitution meant both an indictment by a grand jury and a trial by a jury of 12.

Mr. WEBB. I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks the Constitution applies to the Canal Zone?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I do not think that the Constitution, under the decision of the Supreme Court, which I am bound to accept but which I can differ from, now applies to the Canal Zone, but I do think that whenever Congress in pursuance of its power to enact law for such territory—extend the Constitution to it—and provides for a jury trial in a United States court, it can not provide for a jury trial in any way except that required by the Constitution. Whenever you extend to the Panama Canal Zone or to the Philippines or to any of these territories, which are called "appurtenant," but which are not under the Constitution until Congress so declares, but a part of the United States, the provisions of the Constitution, especially those provisions which contain great guaranties of the right of the citizens, every part and every provision of that Constitution, and the construction of such provisions as made by the courts will be applied in the decisions of cases arising in the territory where the Constitution is by legislative enactment carried. This the Supreme Court of the United States has, in effect, decided in the cases arising in the Philippine Islands.

So if we establish in the zone the right of trial by jury, the citizen will enjoy all the rights which that provision of the Constitution carries or establishes for the citizen in the United States courts. This provision extends to the Canal Zone the right of trial by jury and gives to defendant the same right we enjoy here. It gives all the rights of trial by jury, as is provided by the Constitution of the United States and as it has been interpreted by our courts. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend in line 7 of section 6 by adding after the word "felonies" the following:

"Or misdemeanors where the punishment is by imprisonment or a fine exceeding $20."

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that debate has closed on the paragraph and amendments thereto.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. I thought it was on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is in order, but debate is closed.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES) there were—ayes 52, noes 86.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after "prosecutions," in line 6, page 5, the following: "wherein the accused may be imprisoned in the penitentiary or suffer death or be fined exceeding $200 or be imprisoned in jail more than thirty days." Also strike out "for felonies," in line 7, page 5.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "jury," in line 8, page 5, the following: "of 12 men, and shall be entitled to the same rights of challenge for cause and to the same number of peremptory challenges as defendants charged with felonies are entitled to receive under the laws of the United States."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That jurisdiction is conferred upon the circuit court of appeals for the fifth circuit to review by appeal or writ of error or otherwise any final decision of the circuit court of the Canal Zone, which jurisdiction shall be exercised under rules to be prescribed by said circuit court of appeals, and unless otherwise provided shall be exercised as nearly as may be in conformity with the procedure on appeals or writs of error in said circuit court of appeals. The associate justice of the Supreme Court assigned to the said circuit may likewise designate one or more judges thereof, who may hold a term of said circuit court of appeals at Ancon, Canal Zone, at a time between May 1 and August 1 of each year, notice of which shall be published within the Canal Zone thirty days in advance, for the purpose of hearing and determining appeals that would otherwise be heard by the circuit court of appeals at New Orleans.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting immediately after the words "Canal Zone," in line 12, page 5, the following:

"Which under existing law might be thus reviewed if such final decision were that of a circuit or district court within said fifth circuit."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 18, page 5, the words "one or more" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out, in line 18, page 5, the words "one or more" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, the law creating the court of appeals expressly requires it to be a court of three judges. The appellate power that is attempted to be given to the circuit proposed to be created by this bill for the government of the Canal Zone is to the court of appeals of the fifth circuit, and then comes this provision, if gentlemen will look at the bill, which authorizes the associate justice of the supreme court assigned to the said circuit the right to designate one or more judges thereof, who may hold a term of said court of appeals at Ancon, Panama Canal Zone. Now, this would seem to authorize one circuit judge, appointed by the associate justice of the supreme court of appeals at Ancon Hill. It would be very anomalous that if an appeal went to the fifth circuit there would have to be three judges, or at least a quorum of them, and if the associate justice of the fifth circuit of the United States were to designate one of the circuit judges to go to Ancon, the bill proposes to vest that one person with all the powers of the court of appeals. My amendment is simply to make the bill consistent in that respect.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there is no reason why they should send three judges down there from New Orleans to hold court every year any more than there would be to send three justices from the Supreme Court into a circuit to hold court every year. The bill is designedly drawn the way it is, and it is in the interest of both the administration of justice and economy.

Mr. FITZGERALD. When is the bad, unhealthy season on the Canal Zone—the rainy season?

Mr. MANN. The rainy season commences in the latter part of April, and gets worse along in August, September, October, and November.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What grievance has the gentleman from Illinois that he compels this circuit court of appeals to hold court down there between the 1st of May and the 1st of August?

Mr. MANN. That is as good a time as there is, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that is the rainy season, and it is very unhealthy down there at that time.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. That is not a bad season down there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think they ought to go down there when there would not be any danger.

Mr. MANN. I do not think they will go there enough to hurt their health.

Mr. KEIFER. I am not captious about this matter, but I want to know if it is the purpose of the friends of the bill to create a court of appeals that can sit at Ancon, consisting of one?

Mr. MANN. It is the purpose.

Mr. KEIFER. Then I think the bill fails to even do that effectually. If there is but one judge there under the present law, unless you are going to change the whole system, he can not hold any court of appeals.

Mr. MANN. When the gentleman made his first speech I understood him to say that under this bill he could.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "one," in line 18, and insert "two," so that we may have a court there if the justice of the circuit should designate persons to go there.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That in any case proceeding from a Canal Zone court involving a question arising under the Constitution or treaties of the United States or involving a sentence of death or imprisonment for life, an appeal may be granted by the circuit court of appeals from its final judgment to the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court may also require by certiorari or otherwise any case proceeding from a Canal Zone court to be certified from the circuit court of appeals to the Supreme Court for its review and determination.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in section 8, line 4, after the word "imprisonment," the words "for life."

[Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 81.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the President, through such officer as he may designate, is hereby authorized to grant leases of the public lands in the Canal Zone, for such period, not exceeding twenty-five years, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem advisable, reserving in all cases mineral, oil, and gas rights. No agricultural lease, however, shall be granted for a tract of land in excess of 50 hectares, nor to any person who shall not have first established by affidavit, and by such other proof as may be required, that such person is the head of a family, or over the age of 21 years, that the application for a lease is made in good faith for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation, and not for the benefit of any other person whatsoever, and that such person will faithfully comply with all the requirements of law and executive regulation as to settlement, residence, and cultivation. In granting such leases preference shall be accorded to actual occupants of lands in good faith.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 25, page 6, strike out the word "agricultural."

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, the clause as it stands now gives the right to the President or such officer as he may designate to lease any number of acres.

Mr. MANN. We will accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. RAINEY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Is there any provision in this bill to prevent either the subletting of leased land or the assignment of leases? In other words, is there anything really to prevent the accumulation of large bodies of this property in the hands of one person?

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly; I think so. But I may say to the gentleman that the great object is to get somebody down there to go on the land and raise vegetables for the benefit of the people who are down there.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In reply to that statement, I will say that if the lands are valuable for agricultural purposes, it does not seem to me that there will be any trouble, especially after the canal is completed, to get natives to lease and cultivate them.

Mr. MANN. We sell no land on the Isthmus.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand that.

Mr. MANN. Now, the purpose is to give the men some rights, and we give them the right to lease the land for as much as twenty-five years.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, permit me to say in reply to that suggestion of the gentleman that 50 hectares (about 125 acres) of good agricultural land in the Canal Zone is the equal of 400 acres in the North for the purpose of raising products.

Mr. MANN. I can not agree with the gentleman——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One moment. I do not know how much available valuable agricultural land there is there, but I do know that under this bill, if it becomes a law, the land in the Canal Zone will not be half as carefully guarded as is the land in the Philippine Islands, where we prohibit subleasing and the assigning of leases until a public officer, the Secretary of the Interior or the Chief of the Bureau of Public Lands, first gives his consent. This bill would also permit the leasing of the timber lands.

Mr. MANN. There is no land in the zone of any value as far as timber is concerned. None of the land has any timber on it that is of any value. I know that, for it is nothing but a lot of sharp pines.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am talking particularly of agricultural lands. I am thoroughly convinced that we should prohibit subleasing and prohibit assignments of leases, or there will be an accumulation of these agricultural lands in the hands of a few.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That no portion of the lands of the United States within the Canal Zone shall be leased hereunder unless it shall first be made to appear by a statement or plat filed under authority of the President with the collector of revenues for the Canal Zone that it is not contemplated to use such lands in the work of canal construction or to set the same aside as a town site; and every lease shall be made subject to the provision that if at any time it shall become necessary for the United States to occupy or use any portion of the leased lands it shall have the right to do so without further compensation to the lessee than for the reasonable value of the necessary improvements made upon said tracts by the lessee and a proportionate reduction of rent, the same to be determined by the courts of the Canal Zone if not mutually agreed upon.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting between the words "become" and "necessary," in line 19 on page 7, the words "or be deemed;" and by inserting in line 20, same page, immediately after "necessary," the words "or desirable."

Mr. MANN. That amendment is acceptable.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That all laws and treaties relating to the extradition of persons accused of crime, in force in the United States, to the extent that they may not be in conflict with or superseded by any special treaty entered into between the United States and the Republic of Panama with respect to the Canal Zone, shall extend to and be considered in force in the Canal Zone, and for such purposes, and such purposes only, the Canal Zone shall be considered and treated in all respects as an organized Territory of the United States.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 9 and 10, page 8, strike out the words "for such purposes and such purposes only."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. RAINEY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 27250) to provide for the government of the Canal Zone, the construction of the Panama Canal, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? If not, the vote will be taken on the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

MEXICO'S INTEROCEANIC ROUTE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in the South American Journal, of London, under date of August 15, 1908, there is a very interesting article entitled "Across America: Mexico's New Interoceanic Route—Rival to Panama Canal." It is not a lengthy article, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and also as a Senate document.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed as a document (S. Doc. No. 706) and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACROSS AMERICA—MEXICO'S NEW INTEROCEANIC ROUTE—RIVAL TO PANAMA CANAL.

[From the South American Journal (London), August 15, 1908.]

In September of this year the Tehuantepec National Railway will be opened for European freight and passenger business.

This bald statement will convey very little to the ordinary Englishman, but its importance is fully realized in the United States, where the new line is looked upon as a rival to the future Panama Canal. It is, at any rate, certain to become the most favored of all transcontinental land routes. The Tehuantepec National Railway runs from Puerto Mexico (formerly known as Coatzacoalcos), on the Atlantic, to Salina Cruz, on the Pacific coast. As the bird flies it is about 125 miles across the isthmus from ocean to ocean, but by the road which the railway is compelled to follow the distance is 190 miles. With the exception of the Panama railway, it is the shortest transcontinental route.

From the very earliest times the advantages of the isthmus as a line of communication between the two oceans would appear to have appealed to the minds of travelers and explorers, and it is on record that Humboldt designated it the "bridge of the world's commerce." But the bridge has taken a long time to finish. The project of actually constructing some line of communication dates back nearly half a century. Long before Capt. James Eads planned his ship railway across the isthmus attempts were made both at building ordinary railroads and at digging a canal. From 1857 until 1882 various concessions were granted, generally to American citizens or corporations, and were invariably forfeited owing to the inability of the concessionaires to fulfill their obligations. In the latter year the Mexican Government determined to build the railway themselves, and entered into a contract with Mr. Delfin Sanchez for the construction of the road. This arrangement also proved unsatisfactory, and it was rescinded after about 67 miles of railway had been completed.

A loan of £2,760,000 was then raised, and a new contract was made with Colonel McMurdo for the reconstruction of the 67 miles of the line, which had been built in a hurried and unsatisfactory manner, as well as for the completion of the line, some 142 miles more. The contractor undertook to finish the work in thirty months, but he died in 1890.

FROM OCEAN TO OCEAN.

At length, after considerable difficulties, financial and otherwise, had been surmounted, the railroad was actually completed from ocean to ocean in 1894; but no sooner was it done than defects in construction, as well as want of suitable harbor facilities on both the Gulf and Pacific coasts, made it necessary to begin the work over again.

Much remained to be done in order to adapt the line to heavy traffic; and, recognizing that the railway was to all intents and purposes a valueles property, the Mexican Government began to devise means for rendering the line of some practical use as a route for transcontinental traffic. With this object in view, they entered into negotiations with the firm of S. Pearson & Son (Limited), the great contractors, whose head, Sir Weetman Pearson, M. P., had already gained a great name in Mexico through the successful construction of the drainage canal of the Valley of Mexico and of the port works at Veracruz.

Under the various contracts entered into the firm of Pearson & Son enjoyed, so to speak, a dual character toward the Mexican Government—first, as contractors for the construction of two harbors, at Salina Cruz and Puerto Mexico, and, secondly, as partners in the exploitation of the railway and the ports when completed. This is believed to be the first instance on record in which a national government has taken a private firm into partnership, and speaks volumes for the high reputation for efficiency and integrity which Sir Weetman Pearson had acquired in his earlier dealings with the Mexican Government, as Mr. W. Max Muller, secretary to his Majesty's legation at Mexico, points out in his report on the enterprise.

£10,000,000 EXPENDED.

The cost of the improvement of the railway, which involved its practical reconstruction, has been borne entirely by the Mexican Government, who up to date have certainly spent not less than £2,000,000 in bringing it to its present efficient state. The actual work was carried out by the Pearson firm, not as contractors but as agents, at cost price. On the works at Salina Cruz and Puerto Mexico the expenditure was originally limited to £6,500,000, but this is likely to be considerably exceeded before the harbors and jetties are completed. By the terms of other contracts Messrs. Pearson have entered into a partnership with the Mexican Government under the title of the Tehuantepec National Railway Company. The agreement holds good for a period of fifty-one years from 1902, and the partners furnish in equal shares the working capital of $7,000,000. But Messrs. Pearson are the managers of the property, the Government merely retaining the right of inspection.

It is calculated that since the first work was done on the Tehuantepec route over £10,000,000 have been expended, and before the harbor works are perfected the capital expenditure will have reached £13,000,000. The work, both on the railway and at the ports, seems to have been carried out with the thoroughness that characterizes the enterprises of Messrs. Pearson. "It certainly was a delightful sensation," writes Mr. Max Muller, "to be rushing through the tropical forest at a rate which sometimes exceeded 56 miles per hour, and so smoothly that even during meals one was not incommoded by the speed. I wish travelers could experience such a sensation on the other lines of Mexico," he adds, with feeling.

THROUGH TROPICAL FORESTS.

Many difficulties were encountered by the contractors in the initial periods of the reconstruction of the railway, arising principally from the heavy rainfall during the rainy season, the exuberant vegetation, and other tropical conditions, and also on account of the difficulty in obtaining labor, caused chiefly by the fears of yellow fever. These difficulties have now been triumphantly overcome, and the railroad is in excellent structural condition, with a good roadbed of rock ballast and new steel bridges, while the management appears to be thoroughly capable and efficient.

The equipment of the Tehuantepec road is of the most modern description. The gauge is the standard one of 4 feet 8½ inches; the numerous bridges are of steel, with solid masonry abutments, and culverts of adequate capacity have been put in wherever required. One of the many problems which had to be solved was presented by the luxurient vegetation, which if left to itself would soon overgrow the track and stop the trains. Manual labor is constantly employed to remove the rapid growth, and figures for a considerable sum in the annual maintenance of the road; but in addition the company has made use of an ingenious device for sprinkling the roadbed with crude oil, heated to 210° F., from their oil fields on the Coachapu River, which destroys even the roots of plants, and has the additional advantage of laying the dust, thus adding to the comfort of traveling in a hot climate. The rolling stock is of the most substantial and modern description, and is more numerous in proportion to the mileage than that of any other railway in the Republic. All the locomotives burn oil fuel, which at present is imported from Texas; but very shortly Messrs. Pearson will be able to supply the oil more cheaply and expeditiously from their own oil fields adjacent.

The Mexican Government has spared no expense to make this new interoceanic route between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans across Mexico an unqualified success. The equipment at the railway company's terminal ports, and also the rolling stock, are the best of their kind obtainable, and fully adequate and specially designed to handle transshipment freight in any volume with the greatest safety, economy, and dispatch. The railway company claim that actual handling of the cargo at the terminal ports is in every case reduced to a minimum, as, where possible, all freight is transferred by one operation direct from steamers' holds at Puerto Mexico to covered box cars by the company's electric cranes, and similarly the electric cranes handle the goods also by one operation direct from the railway company's cars alongside the steamer at Salina Cruz to the ship's hold; if necessary, goods can be transferred direct from the ship's hold to the ample steel and masonry warehouses at each port, and vice versa.

There is no lighterage of any description at this company's port terminals, thus avoiding any rehandling; all vessels are discharged alongside the railway company's wharves. Over 26 miles of sidings at each port insure expeditious handling of the cars and quick dispatch of the steamers. The terminal ports of Puerto Mexico and Salina Cruz being absolutely under the control of the Tehuantepec National Railway, the risk of loss or damage to goods on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec is reduced to a minimum. Each terminal of the railway is a bonded zone, securely protected by surrounding iron fences; while as the entrances are protected by customs guards, pilferage should be impossible.

It will be noted that the Isthmus of Tehuantepec is some 600 miles farther north of the equator than Panama. During the greater part of the year the climate on the isthmus is tempered by strong northerly winds. It can not be said that at any time the heat on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec is greater than at New Orleans or Galveston; it is, in fact, but little greater than the average summer heat at New York itself. In comparison with the all-rail transcontinental routes from New York, New Orleans, etc., to the Pacific coast points, it should be remembered that the Tehuantepec route is essentially a sea route, and that the actual haul from the Atlantic to the Pacific occupies no more than half a day. With the frequent steamship connections at both Salina Cruz and Puerto Mexico it is fair to reckon that freight will not be detained on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec longer than at most a week, while the period will generally not be more than two days.

During that period the railway company's equipment adequately protects the cargo from all climatic influence. This compares with an average of five weeks in transit by the transcontinental railways from Atlantic ports to Pacific ports. At Puerto Mexico the Tehuantepec Railway Company has seven steel warehouses and at Salina Cruz four steel warehouses, with two others under construction, making altogether a total warehouse capacity at the terminal ports on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec for 150,000 tons of cargo.

Although this is a new interoceanic route, and through-billing facilities from Europe to all ports on the west coast of America between Valparaiso and Vancouver, B. C., inclusive, are only now offered to European shippers for the first time, yet this route has been successfully handling interoceanic traffic since January, 1907, and over 500,000 tons of American domestic traffic have passed over the Isthmus of Tehuantepec since that date and have been delivered in quick time and good condition.

STEAMSHIP CONNECTIONS.

Salina Cruz will possess one of the finest dry docks in the world, and the largest on the Pacific coast. It is 610 by 89 feet, with a depth on sill at low water of 28 feet. It is now completed, and only waiting for the entrance channel to be dredged. Arrangements have been made for steamship connections from Salina Cruz to all ports on the west coast as far south as Valparaiso and to all ports as far north as Victoria and Vancouver, B. C., as well as to the Far East. There will be regular northbound sailings from Salina Cruz on the Pacific as follows:

American-Hawaiian Line, direct to United States Pacific ports, three a month.

Kosmos Line, to Mexican, also United States Pacific ports, two a month.

Cia Naviera, to Mexican ports, three a month.

Canadian-Mexican-Pacific Line, to Mexican and Canadian ports, one a month.

In addition, the Kosmos Line will have two sailings a month from Salina Cruz to all ports southbound.

The numerous lines already running from England to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Continent to the Gulf, are putting on regular services from European ports to Puerto Mexico, and within a month the following will make this a port of call: Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, Harrison Line, Leyland Line, Cuban Line, Hamburg-American Line, Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, and Compagnia Transatlantica.

"It is always dangerous to prophesy," writes Mr. Max Muller at the end of his report, "but if pluck and perseverance are to have their reward, certainly the Mexican Isthmus route should be a success. The object which the Government and the contractors have had before them has been to handle freight at the lowest possible cost by preparing to do it on the largest scale practicable with modern machinery, and to attain this object neither money nor labor has been spared. To those who, like myself, have only seen the almost completed results, it is difficult to realize the conditions that existed on the isthmus five years ago, when nature was continually undoing the work done, and when the financial prospects appeared gloomy. I have little doubt that the optimistic forecasts of the Mexican Government as to the future of the route will be realized, but in any case the railway will remain as a monument to the enlightened and progressive policy of General Diaz and to the pluck and efficiency of the British firm who have carried through the great work to such a successful conclusion."

Strike out all of section 58, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 66. That the commanding general shall annually transmit to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia an estimate of the amount of money required for the next ensuing fiscal year to pay the expenses authorized by this act, and the said Commissioners shall include the same in their annual estimates of appropriations for the District; and all money appropriated to pay the expenses authorized by this act shall be disbursed in accordance with law."

Change the number of section 59 to 67.

Change the number of section 60 to 68.

Change the number of section 61 to 69.

Change the number of section 62 to 70.

Change the number of section 63 to 71.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I observe in this section and in a number of others the provision is to "strike out all of section 58," and so on. It seems to me that that language would be appropriate if we were undertaking to amend a pending bill, but it does not seem to me to be appropriate when the evident intention is to repeal an existing law. It appears to me that the language in all those instances should be that sections so and so are hereby repealed.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think we are following here the custom in amending sections of existing law. The law we are amending applies to nothing but the District of Columbia, and the bill is as nearly as possible in the form of bills passed by the various States to comply with the Dick law as amended.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The point I make is that the language is not appropriate. To say that a certain section of existing law is hereby stricken out is not appropriate language to use when the intention is to repeal the law.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We are not repealing the law as a whole; we are only repealing certain sections of the law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand; but the effect would be the same. We are repealing section so and so of the law, and that is an entire section.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The effect is exactly the same.

Mr. GALLINGER. We are amending the act.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We are amending the act, and the effect would be the same.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It occurs to me that the language is entirely inappropriate. I merely call attention to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 20, line 23, after "Sec.," to strike out "64" and insert "72;" and on page 21, line 15, after "Sec.," to strike out "64a" and insert "73."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 18, after "Sec.," to strike out "65" and insert "74;" and in line 21, after the word "three," to insert "as amended," so as to read:

SEC. 74. That whenever the words "State or Territory" are used in the "Act to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes," approved January 21, 1903, as amended, they shall be held to apply to and include the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 23, after "Sec.," to strike out "66" and insert "75;" and in line 24, after the words "held to," to strike out "change or otherwise interfere with the dates of existing commissions of officers of the National Guard of the District of Columbia or with the" and insert "alter the status or," so as to read:

SEC. 75. That nothing herein contained shall be held to alter the status or organization of the naval battalion as now provided for by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 2, to insert:

SEC. 76. That any commission issuing under the provisions of this act shall, where the rank remains unchanged, bear the date of the commission now held; and that any officer who has served continuously in the same grade may be recommissioned with rank from date of his original commission to that grade.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REGISTERS OF LAND OFFICES.

The bill (S. 6986) for the relief of registers and former registers of the United States land offices was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 2, line 9, after the words "And provided further," to strike out—

That the sums so refunded shall not exceed the amount authorized in each case to be paid as salary to such receiver.

And to insert:

That said refund shall be made of only such fees which have not entered into the compensation paid to such registers out of the appropriation for salaries and commissions of registers and receivers for any fiscal year.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to refund, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to registers and former registers of United States land offices money earned by them for issuing notices of the cancellation of entries subsequent to July 26, 1892, which money, under the instructions of the Secretary of the Interior, they were erroneously required to deposit in the United States Treasury, contrary to the provisions of the act approved July 26, 1892: Provided, That such refund shall be made only of money deposited subsequent to the approval of the act of July 26, 1892, and shall be made upon accounts stated and certified by the Secretary of the Interior: And provided further, That said refund shall be made of only such fees which have not entered into the compensation paid to such registers out of the appropriation for salaries and commissions of registers and receivers for any fiscal year.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, when that bill was up the other day I objected to it because there was no statement of the amount that would be required to pay these fees. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], I understand, has a statement giving the amount. I should like, before the bill is acted upon, to have him give it to the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I have a copy of a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Claims [Mr. FULTON] by the Secretary of the Interior, in which he gives a list of names and the amount which is to be paid to each. I have footed it up, and the amount is $7,732.11. I ask that the letter of the Secretary be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DECEMBER 5, 1908.

Hon. C. W. FULTON,
Chairman Committee on Claims,
United States Senate.

L., 270), I have the honor to report that the records of this department show that the registers named in the respective bills would receive, upon the passage of the bills, the amounts indicated in the attached table.

Very respectfully,

JAMES RUDOLPH GARFIELD,
Secretary.

Mr. KEAN. I ask that the report of the committee be published, with the letter submitted by the Senator from Minnesota.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report referred to, submitted by Mr. CLAPP on January 25, 1909, is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the foregoing bill, having examined the same, recommend its passage with an amendment.

After the word "Interior," on line 6 of page 2, insert the following: "And provided further, That said refund shall be made of only such fees which have not entered into the compensation paid to such registers out of the appropriation for salaries and commissions of registers and receivers for any fiscal year."

The object of the bill is to refund to registers and former registers of United States land offices the fee of $1 collected by them from successful contestants on homestead land entries for issuing a notice of the cancellation of the entry.

The act approved May 14, 1880, provided that that fee should not be reported by the register to the United States, and they were allowed to retain it as a personal fee.

The act approved August 4, 1886, changed the law and required that all fees earned by the registers should be reported to the Treasury, which requirement was complied with.

The act of Congress approved July 26, 1892 (27 Stat. L., 270), restored the provisions of the act of 1880 and provided that that particular fee need not be reported to the United States.

Notwithstanding the provisions of that latter act, the Interior Department, through its agents, demanded that all fees earned by the registers should be reported to the United States and covered into the Treasury, which was done.

The Secretary now reports that that fee should have been retained by the registers as personal, and the requirement that such fees be reported to the Government was not warranted.

In support of the foregoing bill your committee beg leave to refer to the annexed letters.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
December 31, 1908.

* * * The question now at issue is whether section 2 of the act of May 14, 1880, supra, as amended by the act of July 26, 1892, is correctly interpreted in the case of Cunningham v. Langley, paragraph 9, above, and in the circular of May 16, 1907, paragraph 10, above, or whether the proviso in section 2 of the act of March 3, 1887, that the register shall be entitled to a fee of $1 for giving notice of cancellation, to be paid by the contestant and "not to be reported," means that said fee is to be reported, under the prior legislation set forth in paragraph 4, above, and the prior regulations cited under paragraph 8, above.

I am of the opinion that the words "not to be reported" embodied in section 2 of the act of July 26, 1892, are capable of only one meaning, which can not be more clearly expressed than in the words themselves; that the registers' cancellation fees should not have been reported subsequent to the month of July, 1892, and that provision should be made for payment to Theodore Bruener of $19 cancellation fees earned by him but not paid to him.

I would suggest, however, that instead of introducing a multiplicity of private bills for the relief of registers and ex-registers, Senate bill No. 6986, for the relief of registers and former registers of the United States land offices, introduced by Senator Clapp and referred to the Committee on Claims May 5, 1908, be acted upon. Senate bill 6986 would afford relief to Theodore Bruener and to all registers and ex-registers who have similar claims. * * *

Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., May 7, 1908.

Pursuant to section 882 of the Revised Statutes, I hereby certify that the annexed papers are true copies of the originals as the same appear of record in this department.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and caused the seal of the Department of the Interior to be affixed the day and year first above written.

[SEAL.]

FRANK PIERCE,
First Assistant Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 13, 1908.

SIRS: In reply to your request of the 23d instant I have the honor to report on the amendment intended to be proposed by Senator KITTREDGE to the bill (H. R. ——) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, as follows:

Senator KITTREDGE'S proposed amendment seems to be predicated upon departmental instructions addressed to registers and receivers at United States district land offices on May 16, 1907, and now in force, to wit:

"Paragraph 11. The register's fee for notice of the cancellation of an entry, provided by the act of May 14, 1880 (21 Stat. L., 140), amended by the act of July 26, 1892 (27 Stat. L., 270), shall not be demanded at the time a contest is initiated nor until the entry is canceled and notice thereof given to the successful contestant. The register will collect this fee at the proper time and retain the same as personal. Deposits on account of register's fee for notice of cancellation now reported in the account of unearned fees and unofficial moneys shall, if possible, be returned to the parties who deposited the same, the receiver securing proper voucher therefor."

The feature of said paragraph 11 of importance herein is that the register was directed to collect and retain the fee of $1 for giving notice of the cancellation of an entry; whereas prior to the instructions above quoted and under departmental instructions of March 15, 1887 (5 L. D., 577), the receiver was directed to collect the register's cancellation fee and to deposit the same to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States pursuant to section 2240, United States Revised Statutes, and acts of August 4, 1886 (29 Stat. L., 239), and March 3, 1887 (24 Stat. L., 526).

The last-mentioned instructions apparently had the support of law until the passage of the act of July 26, 1892 (27 Stat., 270), amending section 2 of the act of May 14, 1880 (21 Stat., 140), to read:

"SEC. 2. In all cases where any person has contested, paid the land-office fee, and procured the cancellation of any preemption homestead, or timber-culture entry, he shall be notified by the register of the land office of the district in which such land is situated of such cancellation, and shall be allowed thirty days from date of such notice to enter said lands: Provided, That said register shall be entitled to a fee of $1 for the giving of such notice, to be paid by the contestant, and not to be reported."

Assuming that the basis of paragraph 11 of the circular of May 16, 1907, is correct, to wit, that the proviso, cited above, in the act of July 26, 1892, places the register's cancellation fee without the pale of section 2240, Revised Statutes, and acts making appropriations for salaries and commissions of registers and receivers, by force of the express direction that the cancellation fee is "not to be reported," it follows that such fees ought not to have been reported subsequent to the act of July 26, 1892, and that registers are equitably entitled to such cancellation fees as have been covered into the Treasury since July 26, 1892, and which have not entered into their compensation or been paid to them since that date under the appropriations for salaries and commissions of registers and receivers.

It should be noted that cancellation fees have been paid to the registers from the appropriations for salaries and commissions of registers and receivers in all instances where their earnings, including cancellation fees, have been less than the maximum of $3,000 per year, specified in section 2240, Revised Statutes.

I therefore recommend that Senator KITTREDGE'S proposed amendment be amended in the following particulars:

1. By limiting its application to cancellation fees earned subsequent to July 26, 1892.

2. By limiting the reimbursement to registers to such cancellation fees as have been deposited in the Treasury and have not entered into the compensation paid to them under appropriations for salaries and commissions.

Both of the above suggestions may be incorporated in Senator KITTREDGE'S amendment by inserting therein after the word "Treasury," on line 10, the following: "subsequent to July 26, 1892, and which have not entered into the compensation paid to such registers out of the appropriation for salaries and commissions of registers and receivers for any fiscal year, $100,000."

I may add that several claims for cancellation fees earned by registers and covered into the Treasury are now pending before the Court of Claims.

Respectfully submitted.

FRANK PIERCE,
Acting Secretary.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS,
United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 13, 1908.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 8th instant in which you call attention to Senator KITTREDGE'S proposed amendment to the bill making appropriation for sundry civil expenses:

"To reimburse registers of United States land offices for the amount of all fees for notices of cancellation authorized to be paid by them by the act entitled 'An act to amend section 2 of an act approved May 14, 1880, being an act for the relief of settlers on public lands,' approved June 26, 1892, but which, pursuant to instructions of the Department of the Interior, prior to May 6, 1907, were collected by receivers of public moneys and deposited in the Treasury, ——— dollars."

You ask if further amendment will be necessary to authorize reimbursement to former registers, and in reply I beg to suggest that from the language of his amendment it seems to have been the intention of Senator KITTREDGE to extend relief to former registers as well as to those now in office, and in my judgment his amendment is susceptible of such an interpretation, but if there is doubt on the subject the effect of the bill may be made certain by adding the words "and former registers," after the word "register," in line 1 of the proposed amendment. Please notice my report to the Senate committee on Mr. KITTREDGE'S amendment.

Very respectfully,

FRANK PIERCE,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. T. P. GORE,
United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., April 29, 1908.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 24th instant, in which you state that the proposed legislation having for its object the payment to registers of United States land offices of certain fees for giving notices of the cancellation of entries is now before the Appropriation Committee of the House of Representatives, and asking for full information as to the practice of this department in regard to the disposition of such fees under the several acts approved August 4, 1886; March 3, 1887 (24 Stat., 239 and 526); and July 26, 1892 (27 Stat., 270), I have the honor to advise you as follows:

On March 15, 1887 (5 L. D., 577), a circular was issued citing the acts of August 4, 1886, and March 3, 1887 (supra), in which registers were instructed that—

"The fee of $1 authorized to be returned by the register for giving notice of the cancellation of an entry, as provided by the act of May 14, 1880 (21 Stat., 140), will be paid to the receiver, who will deposit it with other fees when the entry is canceled and the notice given.

"Registers of land offices have no right officially to receive any moneys whatever, except such as are paid to them by receivers as salary, fees, and commissions."

The act of July 26, 1892 (27 Stat., 270), amending section 2 of the act of May 14, 1880, contains the proviso "that said register shall be entitled to a fee of $1 for the giving of such notice, to be paid by the contestant and not to be reported."

In the case of Cunningham v. Longley (18 L. D., 76), decided on February 12, 1894, the department held that—

"The proviso to the second section of the act of May 14, 1880, entitled him (the register) 'to a fee of $1 for the giving of such notice, to be paid by the contestant and not to be reported;' while this department will, in proper cases, exact its payment, neither the Government nor the contestee has any interest therein. It is a matter personal to the register, and he alone has standing to complain of its nonpayment."

Notwithstanding the proviso in the act of July 26, 1892, that said fee was "not to be reported," that is, to be accounted for, and the decision just cited, the circular of March 15, 1887, remained in full force and effect until the issuance of the circular of May 16, 1907 (35 L. D., 568), since which date the register has been authorized to collect the cancellation fee "and retain the same as personal."

From March 15, 1887, to May 16, 1907, it was held that the register should not be paid any fees that would increase his compensation to over $3,000 per annum. This holding was correct until the passage of the act of July 26, 1892, which act is independent of the act making appropriation for salaries and commissions of registers and receivers, this latter act providing only that they should each be paid no more than $3,000 from that appropriation, and not interdicting the payment of moneys by settlers to the register for notices of the cancellation of entries, which construction of said acts required the issuance of paragraph 11 of the circular of May 16, 1907.

Very respectfully,

FRANK PIERCE,
First Assistant Secretary.

Hon. BIRD MCGUIRE,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 29, 1908.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 24th instant, in which you state that the proposed amendment by Senator ALFRED B. KITTREDGE, having for its object the payment to registers of the United States land offices of certain fees for giving notices of the cancellation of entries, is now before the Appropriation Committee of the Senate, and asking for full information as to the practice of this department in regard to the disposition of such fees under the several acts approved August

4, 1886; March 3, 1887 (24 Stat., 239 and 526); and July 26, 1892 (27 Stat., 270), I have the honor to advise you as follows:

On March 15, 1887 (5 L. D., 577), a circular was issued citing the acts of August 4, 1886, and March 3, 1887 (supra), in which registers were instructed that—

"The fee of $1, authorized to be retained by the register for giving notice of the cancellation of an entry, as provided by the act of May 14, 1880 (21 Stat., 140), will be paid to the receiver, who will deposit it with other fees when the entry is canceled and the notice given.

"Registers of land offices have no right officially to receive any moneys whatever, except such as are paid to them by receivers as salary, fees, and commissions."

The act of July 26, 1892 (27 Stat., 270), amending section 2 of the act of May 14, 1880, contains the proviso "That said register shall be entitled to a fee of $1 for the giving of such notice, to be paid by the contestant and not to be reported."

In the case of Cunningham v. Longley (18 L. D., 76), decided on February 12, 1894, the department held that "the proviso to the second section of the act of May 14, 1880, entitled him (the register) 'to a fee of $1 for the giving of such notice, to be paid by the contestant and not to be reported;' while this department will, in proper cases, exact its payment, neither the Government nor the contestee has any interest therein. It is a matter personal to the register, and he alone has standing to complain of its nonpayment."

Notwithstanding the proviso in the act of July 26, 1892, that said fee was "not to be reported"—that is, to be accounted for—and the decision just cited, the circular of March 15, 1887, remained in full force and effect until the issuance of the circular of May 16, 1907 (35 L. D., 568), since which date the register had been authorized to collect the cancellation fee "and retain the same as personal."

From March 15, 1887, to May 16, 1907, it was held that the register should not be paid any fees that would increase his compensation to over $3,000 per annum. This holding was correct until the passage of the act of July 26, 1892, which act is independent of the act making appropriation for salaries and commissions of registers and receivers, this latter act providing only that they should each be paid no more than $3,000 from that appropriation and not interdicting the payment of moneys by settlers to the register for notices of the cancellation of entries, which construction of said acts required the issuance of paragraph 11 of the circular of May 16, 1907.

Very respectfully,

FRANK PIERCE,
First Assistant Secretary.

Hon. H. M. TELLER,
United States Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS OF CAREY ACT.

The bill (H. R. 26216) to extend the provisions of section 4 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes," approved August 18, 1894, to the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to extend to the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico all the provisions of section 4 of the act of Congress approved August 18, 1894, being chapter 301 to Supplement to Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes," and the amendments thereto, and such Territories upon complying with the provisions of the act shall be entitled to have and receive all of the benefits therein conferred upon the States.

Mr. KEAN. I ask the Senator from Wyoming kindly to make an explanation of what benefit the two Territories will receive by the passage of this bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The benefit the Territories will receive will be the same benefit that the States in the arid regions now receive from the application of the Carey Act, so called, the best act that has ever been passed for the arid States. This bill provides for extending that act to the Territories named in the bill, which were inadvertently omitted from its original provisions.

Mr. KEAN. I hope they will remain Territories for some time to come.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator from Wyoming has no further remarks to make——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have no remarks to make. I am merely answering a question.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, when this measure was before the Committee on Public Lands I stated that I would not oppose its consideration at any time, but that I reserved the right to make a statement to the Senate on the question of our power to do the things proposed to be done by his bill.

It is an important question. The Territories of Arizona and New Mexico have only temporary governments. They can make no laws, except subject to the approval of Congress, and while I am in thorough sympathy with the Carey Act and would like to see it extended to every portion of the United States where arid lands exist, yet I doubt the power of those Territories to take title as it is provided by the terms of the Carey Act the States shall take title.

But, Mr. President, inasmuch as in a very few minutes the Senate will be compelled to proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives to take up another matter in joint session with the House, I do not feel that I could make the statement that I desire to make with that fullness with which it should be made before the Senate votes upon this question. I do not ask that the bill go over. I only suggest, inasmuch as we have only six minutes before leaving this Hall, that the matter be retained for consideration. I am advised by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] that we only have one minute.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I exceedingly regret that the Senator feels it necessary to oppose this measure. My purpose in pressing it at this time is simply because the legislature of New Mexico is now in session, and unless early action is taken on this bill no benefit can accrue to the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico under the bill until the next session of the legislature.

Mr. HEYBURN. It may be that the Senator is entirely right in the matter, and it may, and probably will, be that he will succeed in his wish for the favorable consideration of the bill; but I feel it my duty, before the Senate acts upon it, to make the statement that I want to make. The time is up now for further proceedings in this body. I will not ask that the bill go over, nor do I wish to delay it, but I simply desire to make a statement before it is passed.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. They have already received grants. They have taken the lands under the law and now hold them.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will stand ready to answer the suggestions of the Senator when we have time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What disposition does the Senator from Idaho desire made of the bill now under consideration? Does he desire that it go over?

Mr. HEYBURN. I presume everything will have to go over, Mr. President, without a motion. We have an order of business for this hour, and it is after the time for its execution now.

ESTATE OF JOHN H. HAMITER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4024) for the relief of John H. Hamiter, which were in line 4, after the word "to," to insert "Allen H. Hamiter, administrator of the estate of;" in line 4, after the name "Hamiter," to insert the word "deceased," and to amend the title so as to read: "An act for the relief of Allen H. Hamiter, administrator of the estate of John H. Hamiter, deceased."

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, that is a bill that was introduced by my colleague [Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas]. As I understand all that is necessary is that the Senate concur in the House amendments, and I make that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

Mr. KEAN. What is the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The title of the bill will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4024) for the relief of John H. Hamiter.

Mr. DAVIS. It is a local bill.

Mr. KEAN. Is it a bill that has already passed the Senate?

Mr. DAVIS. It has passed the Senate and has passed the House with amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

COUNT OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

At 12 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senators, under the concurrent resolution providing for the count of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, the Senate will now proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The Senate, preceded by the Vice-President, the Secretary, and the Acting Sergeant-at-Arms, thereupon proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives for the purpose of participating in the count of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

The Senate returned to its Chamber at 1 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., and the Vice-President resumed the chair.

Mr. BURROWS, one of the tellers appointed on behalf of the Senate in pursuance of the concurrent resolution of the two Houses to ascertain the result of the election for President and Vice-President of the United States, said:

EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS OF CAREY ACT.

Mr. KEAN. We were on the calendar under Rule VIII.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will resume consideration of the bill which was under discussion at the time when the Senate left its Hall.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 26216) to extend the provisions of section 4 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes," approved August 18, 1894, to the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am very loath to intrude this question upon the Senate at the present time, and did it not seem to me one of more than passing importance, I would let it go by.

The proposition is one of the power of Congress to do what it is proposed to do by this bill, and it seems to me it is a character of question that ought never to be waived, because if there is anything we must first consider in legislating it is our power to legislate.

Mr. President, the Carey Act provides that upon certain proceedings by a State the Government shall deed to the State lands to be taken up under the Carey Act. That act has been in operation for some years, and it is the very best public-land act, outside of the homestead law, ever enacted. I am in sympathy with it, and I should like to see it extended to the Territories, if I were sure we had the power to do it. But I do not think, after some investigation of the question, that a Territory is capable of receiving title from the Government of the United States under the provisions of the Carey Act.

The territorial government is a temporary government. It takes the use of public lands through the title of the United States and not through any title in itself. It is proposed to extend the provisions of the Carey Act to the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona; and I hope that those people will very speedily receive the benefit of that act, because I sincerely hope that they will soon be States, when they would need no further legislation of a serious character. But under what provision of law or the Constitution a Territory can receive the title to lands from the United States for the purpose of distribution I am unable to satisfy my mind. I think there is none.

I merely desired, and I thought it was my duty at this time, to call the attention of the Senate to it, and I regret that the luncheon hour has made the Senate so thin that only a few will perhaps be able to consider these questions at all when they vote upon the pending bill. But if we should proceed to enact this law, authorizing the Government of the United States, upon the application of a State to grant it certain lands under the provisions of the Carey Act and a Territory were to undertake to receive title as a State, in my judgment no title would pass, and we should be laying the foundation for a confusion in the law affecting the titles to those States. That we ought not to do. There is a sovereign power in the State under which it may hold title to land and may take a grant of land, but the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona have no final jurisdiction even to legislate. Legislation by the terms of the organic act of those Territories must be submitted to Congress under the limitations prescribed in the act.

I know of no instance, but I am told there are instances where we have granted lands to a Territory. However, I feel quite sure that there was no power to take the grant in the Territory, and that the title is still in the United States. I have had some experience, having lived in Territories for a number of years. We did not take a grant of title to the lands which the Government gave us for any purpose. They were merely set aside for our use.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly; any number.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In the time when the Senator lived in the Territory of Idaho, did the Territory take the title to land there?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think it did not take title to the land. I think the Government, in effect, set aside the land for its use.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am not speaking of the Government. My recollection is that the Territory of Idaho had numerous public institutions, its state capitol and other institutions. Did the Territory hold the title to the land upon which those institutions were erected?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; because it was necessary when we were admitted as a State to enact in the law title in the State.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Exactly; title from the Territory into the State, but not from the original grantee.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; the initial admission act of the State which the Senator in part represents and the State which I in part represent grants the land for school purposes, it grants the land for the capitol——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator evades my question.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will just give me a chance to go on, I will answer his question.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will.

Mr. HEYBURN. The lands upon which the territorial capitol stood, the lands upon which the penitentiary stood, and the insane asylum, and the State University had to come to the State through an act of Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6484) to establish postal savings banks for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEAN. I ask the Senator from Montana if he desires specially to go on with this bill. There are a number of unobjected cases on the calendar that a great many Senators are interested in, and I think if we could run on with the calendar for a little while we could get through with a good deal of business. Of course I do not want to interfere with the unfinished business, because I know it has been laid aside rather unduly lately.

Mr. CARTER. I am quite anxious, of course, to see the calendar disposed of, but I have greater anxiety to see the unfinished business disposed of.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield to me to present a conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill?

Mr. KEAN. Before the Senator presents the report, I will ask the Senator from Montana how long he thinks he would like to go on to-day with the unfinished business?

Mr. CARTER. I think we can dispose of all the amendments pending this afternoon, and I hope we shall vote at no very distant hour on the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I simply want to impress upon the Senator from Montana the necessity of the passage of the pending bill very early if the bill is to be of any advantage to the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico. It is well known that the legislatures of those Territories are now in session and will soon adjourn. If the act is to be extended to those Territories, it will need legislative action before they can take advantage of it. I think we can get through with the bill in a short time.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. TILLMAN. The bill which was under consideration when the morning hour expired goes on the calendar?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is now on the calendar.

Mr. TILLMAN. Therefore it can not come up again unless it is called up by unanimous consent or is reached in its order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Or by motion.

Mr. TILLMAN. It goes to the foot of the calendar, then?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No; it retains its place on the calendar.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to say that if the unfinished business is not to be considered and there is a proposal to further discuss this measure, noting that none of the Senators on this side who belong to the Public Lands Committee are in their places, I want to object to its further consideration, because it seems to me there are questions involved here of some moment, as to whether a Territory can properly enter upon obligations and perform the necessary acts to protect the public domain. Therefore, unless that bill is to be laid aside, I shall object to its further consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The consideration of the bill ceased at 2 o'clock.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is what I wanted to find out. There was some discussion as to whether the unfinished business would be laid aside and the consideration of that bill resumed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the rule its consideration is not carried beyond the hour of 2 o'clock.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CARTER. The conference report which the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] desires to present is a privileged matter, and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. WARREN. I desire before the report is read to say that it is a report of a partial agreement, and I will state the condition.

The Senate added to the bill $664,224 in 210 items, and the amount of the bill as passed by the Senate was $32,326,984.

The net amount reduced in conference so far is $16,440. The amount in disagreement is $322,000 in 24 items, which includes the salaries of the President, Vice-President, and Speaker, and the $5,000 allowance for horses and carriages for Vice-President and salaries of judges of the various courts.

Other than the items mentioned the conference report is a complete agreement. There were 210 items in disagreement.

The report was read as follows:

CITIZENSHIP OF NAVAL DESERTERS—VETO MESSAGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, on motion of Mr. HALE (S. Doc. No. 708), was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate:

I return herewith without approval S. 5473, an act amending section 1998 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and to authorize the Secretary of the Navy in certain cases to mitigate or remit the loss of rights of citizenship imposed by law upon deserters from the naval service, and I inclose the adverse reports of the Secretaries of War and the Navy and the Attorney-General. The reasons set forth in these three reports seem to me conclusive. A previous Secretary of the Navy has recommended that in the case of deserters from the naval service the Secretary of the Navy shall be given power to mitigate or remit the loss of the rights of citizenship where the offense was committed in time of peace, and where the exercise of such clemency will not be prejudicial to the public interest. With the purpose of this recommendation I entirely agree, but my attention has been called to the fact that under the decision of the Supreme Court in re Garland, Fourth Wallace, it is a matter of grave doubt whether legislation vesting a portion of the pardoning power in any officer or department of the Government except the President is warranted under the Constitution, the language of the Supreme Court being such as to make it at least doubtful whether this pardoning power can be given to any other official, can be added to or subtracted from, or can be rendered subject to legislative control. In view of this decision the power to pardon, or to remit or mitigate the loss of rights of citizenship, which is of the nature of a pardon, can only be exercised by the President.

But aside from this, the bill is gravely defective and goes far beyond what the Secretary of the Navy recommended. The language is confused and conflicting, so that the exact meaning of the proposed act is not plain. But in the first place it is clear that while it provides for the abolition of the penalty of loss of citizenship in regard to deserters both from the Army and the Navy, yet, curiously enough, it only specifies the Secretary of the Navy and not the Secretary of War as having power to mitigate or remit the penalty in question. This alone would render it in the highest degree inadvisable to sign the bill, for of course it can not have been the intention of Congress to make a one-sided discrimination of an entirely illogical kind between the Army and the Navy in this matter. But in addition it seems probable that the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy to pardon offenders, which was what the previous Secretary of the Navy asked for, is only extended to offenses that have already been committed. As to offenses hereafter committed, while the language of the bill is sufficiently confusing to make it a little difficult to say with certainty what it means, it appears probable that it means that hereafter there shall be no loss of citizenship in any case where a man deserts from the Army or Navy in time of peace, and this no matter how heinous his offense. Such a provision would work grave wrong; for, if enacted into law it would seriously embarrass the discipline of the military and naval services, and would completely mislead public opinion as to the grave moral obliquity involved in the crime of desertion. Desertions from the Army and Navy are already a crying evil; in very many cases the crime is committed under circumstances which show deliberate intention and hardened indifference to the interests of the country. It appears therefore that the present bill would actually encourage hardened offenders to commit a heinous crime against the flag and the Nation, and as regards future cases would refuse to permit discrimination between such offenders and those whose offense is committed under circumstances which so mitigate it as to make it comparatively venial and really amounting to not much more than absence without leave; while in addition, as already pointed out, it discriminates in most curious fashion and probably quite unintentionally between what is required in cases which arise in the Navy and what is required in cases which arise in the Army.

There would be no objection to the proposed act if it were drawn up as recommended by the then Secretary of the Navy a year ago, and if the pardoning power were lodged in the President, who could then exercise it both as regards the Army and the Navy. The bill would then read as follows:

That every person who hereafter deserts the military or naval service of the United States, or who, being duly enrolled, departs the jurisdiction of the district in which he is enrolled, or goes beyond the limits of the United States, with intent to avoid any draft into the military or naval service, lawfully ordered, shall be liable to all the penalties and forfeitures of section nineteen hundred and ninety-six: Provided, That the loss of rights of citizenship imposed by law upon deserters from the military or naval service may be mitigated or remitted by the President where the offense was committed in time of peace and where the exercise of such clemency will not be prejudicial to the public interests.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 10, 1909.

EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS OF CAREY ACT.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration——

Mr. CARTER. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana demands the regular order, which is the unfinished business.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] advises me that the bill which was under consideration at the hour of 2 o'clock can be disposed of within five minutes. In order that a vote may be taken on the bill which has been discussed, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside for five minutes, in order to permit the Senator to have the bill disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] that the unfinished business be laid aside for five minutes?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I withdraw any objection that I may have made to the passage of the bill referred to by the Senator from Wyoming.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER]? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 26216) to extend the provisions of section 4 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes," approved August 18, 1894, to the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is that the bill to which I objected a short time ago?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the bill to which the Senator from South Carolina objected.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know nothing about the merits of the bill, but I know Senators on this side of the Chamber who belong to the committee from which it is reported, who are not now here, and the bill can just as well go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. TILLMAN. Why not let the bill go over until to-morrow?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The difficulty of letting it go over until to-morrow, if the Senator please, is that if it goes over until to-morrow it will probably go over day after day. It is simply a bill for the benefit of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand that—that is, on its face.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is the truth.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not know that, and I should prefer that some of the Senators on this side of the Chamber who belong to the Committee on Public Lands should be here and tell us so, not that I dispute the Senator's good faith or honesty of purpose or anything of that sort; but one of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber has expressed a doubt as to whether or not a Territory can occupy the place of a State under the Carey Act. That being the case, I should think the Senator could very well let this matter go over until to-morrow.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, when this measure was before the Committee on Public Lands nearly all the members of the committee were present, both Republicans and Democrats, and the only objection made to the bill came from the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. All of the committee, except that Senator, were entirely unanimous. There is no question about the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then it is just as easy to wait until to-morrow and let them say so.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to remind the Senator from South Carolina that, in order to make this bill effective for the benefit of these Territories, it must be passed at an early date.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope it will be effective for the States; and there is some proposition here to make them States, if not at this session, then at the next session. But this bill must wait until to-morrow if my objection can carry it over.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator's objection will certainly carry it over.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I certainly shall object, though I think I have the interest of the people of New Mexico and Arizona at heart as much as any one in this Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. CARTER. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6484) to establish postal savings banks for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CARTER. On that amendment I call for a division. We perceive that the amendment proposes to strike out section 10 and to substitute a new section for section 11.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana demands a division of the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before we have a division, I want to know what the amendment is, and I should like to have it again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again stated, at the request of the Senator from North Dakota.

The SECRETARY. The proposed amendment is as follows:

Strike out section 10.

Strike out section 11 and substitute therefor the following:

SEC. 10. That the Postmaster-General shall, as herein provided, deposit postal savings depository funds received at the post-office in any city, town, or village in the bank or banks organized under the national law or a state or territorial law and doing business in such city, town, or village, ratably according to their capital; and if in any such city, town, or village there be no such bank, or if the funds have been received at a post-office not within a city, town, or village, then in the nearest bank or banks in the State or Territory: Provided, however, That no depository funds shall be deposited in any bank organized under a state or territorial law unless the laws of the State or Territory in which it is located require public supervision and examination: And provided further, That such examination shows the bank to be solvent not only as to creditors, but with unimpaired capital.

Before a deposit is made in any bank as above authorized the bank shall agree to pay interest thereon computed upon the daily balance at the rate of not less than 2¼ per cent per annum. Each bank receiving deposits under the authority of this act shall from time to time give such suitable bond or bonds, with surety or sureties to be approved by the Postmaster-General, as will indemnify the Government against loss. If the banks herein described as the banks in which the funds are to be deposited refuse to accept a deposit or deposits upon the terms and conditions above prescribed, then and in such case the Postmaster-General may use any bank designated by him and complying with said terms and conditions for such deposit or deposits; or he may invest the same in state, territorial, county, or municipal bonds to be selected by him with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Attorney-General. Interest and profits shall be applied first to the payment of interest accruing to depositors in postal savings depositories as hereinbefore provided, and the excess thereof, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury as part of the postal revenues. For the purposes of this act the word "Territory" as used herein shall be held to include the District of Columbia, the district of Alaska, and Porto Rico.

Strike out the figures "12" in line 15 on page 7 and substitute the figures "11."

Strike out the figures "13" in line 25 on page 7 and substitute the figures "12."

Strike out the figures "14" in line 9 on page 8 and substitute the figures "13."

Strike out the figures "15" in line 21 on page 8 and substitute the figures "14."

Strike out the figures "16" in line 8 on page 9 and substitute the figures "15."

Strike out the figures "17" in line 1 on page 10 and substitute the figures "16."

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire if the amendment has been printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been printed. The amendment has been modified in one particular since its printing. The Secretary will state the particular in which the amendment has been modified.

The SECRETARY. On line 8 of the printed amendment, after the word "village," the words "ratably according to their capital" were inserted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That modification of the amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I believe the question upon this amendment is clearly divisible, and therefore I have no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. BORAH. In order that we may understand precisely what we are voting on, I should like to have a statement as to what division takes place.

Mr. CARTER. I did not hear the statement of the Senator from Idaho.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho desires that the Senator from Montana shall restate the precise division of the question embraced in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Iowa first provides that section 10 shall be stricken out, and then provides a substitute for section 11. Of course these amendments are clearly divisible; but the amendment proposing to strike out section 10 is very clearly subject to subdivision, because there are several propositions involved in section 10. It is readily conceivable that a Senator might favor one or two propositions in that section and be opposed to the one remaining. I will state what the propositions are.

First, section 10 provides—

That postal savings depository funds are hereby declared to be public moneys and subject to the safeguards and preferences provided by statute therefor.

That is one clear and distinct proposition.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. If that is one of the distinct propositions, one of the subdivisions, I do not care to be heard upon that particular division. That was the reason I asked the Senator from Montana to state the divisions.

Mr. CARTER. I will ask a vote, with the permission of the Senate, and I hope it will be granted, upon that proposition standing alone.

The two following propositions are equally separable from the body of the section. One provides that the money shall be exempt from garnishment or seizure, under legal process, while in the possession of the Government. The second provides that the funds "shall not be subject to taxation by the United States or any State, county, or municipality."

The question of garnishment stands alone as a separate, distinct proposition. The question of taxation is equally separate and distinct, neither depending upon the judgment of the Senate with reference to the other.

Then comes a final or concluding clause in section 10, to which I imagine no Senator will have any objection, which provides that—

No person connected with the Post-Office Department shall disclose to any person other than the depositor the amount of his or her deposit, unless directed so to do by the Postmaster-General.

I think this feature of the section all will approve without dissent. It would be strange indeed if the postmasters of the country and the clerks in the post-offices were permitted, without any restraint whatever, to make common street gossip of the state of a depositor's account. No bank permits its administration any such freedom with reference to depositors' affairs, and I believe it is currently understood that banks will only yield a statement when compelled so to do by due process of law.

Now, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the first portion of the amendment, proposing to strike out that part of the section relating to the safeguarding of the funds, be considered as disagreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not able to concur with the Senator from Montana with respect to the first clause or division of this section. It reads:

SEC. 10. That postal savings depository funds are hereby declared to be public moneys—

As a mere abstract announcement, I have no objection to that part of the section. In my opinion, they are and would be public moneys without any such characterization in this proposed statute. But that part of the section to which the Senator refers, the proposed amendment to which he now asks be disagreed to, proceeds:

And subject to the safeguards and preferences provided by statute therefor.

My particular objection to that clause in the section is that my amendment is based upon the hypothesis that there shall be no preference to the United States growing out of a deposit of these moneys in the banks in which they are deposited. I hope that the fairness of that suggestion will so effectually appeal to the Senate that my amendment in that respect will not be disagreed to.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the only question involved in this portion of section 10 is whether it is the disposition of the Senate to throw about these postal funds the safeguards provided by the criminal statutes for public moneys.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator understand that the word "preferences" as contained in this section is intended to throw about these deposits the safeguards of the criminal statutes?

Mr. CARTER. The safeguards would unquestionably relate to the criminal statutes. Preferences such as attach to the public moneys ought not to be denied funds of this kind. I believe in guarding these funds with the greatest and most jealous possible care, and no safeguard or preference given the public moneys is too good for the postal savings funds.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, might I recall something of the discussion the other day upon this point? I have no desire to take away from these depositors entire security, but I am opposed fundamentally to giving their deposits a preference or a lien upon the assets or resources of a bank over other deposits in any such bank. It seems to me when you examine comprehensively the purpose that is in view it must be apparent that to give these depositors a prior lien over the ordinary customary depositors in the banks is to inflict upon them a most serious injustice.

This part of section 10 is inseparably connected with section 11, in which it is expressly provided that there shall be a lien upon the resources of the bank in favor of the Government upon its deposits.

Mr. CARTER. May I interrupt the Senator at that point, in order that possibly we may make progress by reaching an understanding? If the word "preferences," after the word "and," in line 24, should be stricken out in this part of the section, I understand that the Senator would have no objection to it, because the safeguards would manifestly relate only to the application of the criminal statutes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should have no objection to it if you would strike out the word "preferences," and add to that clause in the section such words as would make it perfectly clear that only the criminal safeguards or protection of the laws are assured for these moneys. With that understanding, I would have no objection to that part of the section.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, about the same time the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] submitted his amendment I also offered an amendment covering in many respects the same ground. The principal difference was that my amendment did not cover as much ground. The amendment that is proposed here covers several different and distinct propositions. One of the propositions, as I understand, is that the deposits made by the Government in the banks shall have preference over claims of other creditors of the bank. Upon that proposition I am certainly in accord with the views of the Senator from Iowa, but I am doubtful whether striking out the single word "preferences" will meet the objection, because a preference is certainly a protection; and striking out the word "preferences" alone would not leave the section in such a shape that it would under the other words used make a preference in favor of the United States for its deposits. I wish to discuss another feature of this matter, but I understand it is agreed that this shall be voted upon as a separate proposition. I only suggest to the Senator that before he accepts the amendment suggested by the Senator from Montana the proposition should be very carefully considered and the language carefully drawn.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from North Dakota did not understand me to agree that the amendment should be disregarded, or this part of the section retained merely because of the striking out of the word "preferences." I expressly stated that if that part of the section were so changed as to make it certain that it referred only to the criminal statutes, then I would have no objection to it, although I may add that the criminal statutes will be effective in protecting the deposits without any reference to them in the law, if these moneys are public moneys, and I assume that nobody will question the proposition that they are public moneys when they come into the hands of the Government and the Government undertakes an absolute obligation to repay.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the portion of section 10 under discussion was inserted through extra caution. But in order to defer the question of preference for deposits until we reach that question distinctly in section 11, I am prepared to meet the Senator's views by moving to strike out the words "and preferences," and inserting after the word "by" and before the word "statute" the words "the criminal," and making the word "statute" plural, so that it will read:

Subject to the safeguards provided by the criminal statutes therefor.

If the Senator will withdraw his amendment as to that portion of the section, I will move the amendment which I have suggested.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator, in consenting to strike out the word "preferences," does not intend that the Government shall have a preferred claim in the matter of savings-bank deposits?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I would not assent to this change at this point in the bill were it not for the fact that in the succeeding section, section 11, specific provision is made for the preference of government deposits in the banks.

In order to reach the matter otherwise, I move that the amendment of the Senator be laid on the table as to the portion of section 10 concluding with the word "therefor," on line 24, and that the section be amended as I have suggested.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not agree that the amendment should be laid on the table.

Mr. CARTER. Only that portion indicated. I understand we have agreed to divide the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not very familiar with parliamentary procedure in the Senate; but reaching it as specifically and as directly as possible, I want to say that if the words the Senator has suggested be added to this clause of the section and the words "and preferences" are stricken out, I have no objection to that part of the section which remains becoming a part of the law.

Mr. CARTER. Then, Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator withdraws his amendment to this portion of the section as amended.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose the most direct way of reaching it, then, would be for the Senator to move to strike out that part of my amendment which touches section 10 and insert the words which he now proposes. In that way the Senator will reach the section he wants.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that the Senator from Montana can move to amend the section proposed to be stricken out. Then the motion will recur, if the Senator insists upon a division of the question, as to whether the three first lines in section 10 shall be stricken out. If the Senator from Iowa accepts the amendment, of course the matter will remain in the bill.

Mr. CARTER. The amendment is accepted.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have agreed that it is fair to divide this question, but not in the manner suggested by the Senator from Montana. My amendments propose, first, to strike out section 10 and, next, to substitute something for section 11. I agreed that the question might be divided so far as section 10 was concerned, but I have not assented that the amendment to strike out section 10 shall be subdivided in the way suggested by the Sentor from Montana.

I shall not, however, interpose any objection that will prevent the Senate from reaching the real heart of the matter in whatever way it seems best to reach it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the question recurs for the Vice-President to determine whether the motion to strike out section 10 is divisible, the section embodying four different and distinct propositions. As to some of those propositions Senators are favorable; as to others, certain Senators are opposed; and the purpose of separating the amendment is to allow the Senate to vote upon the separate propositions according to its judgment.

Mr. BURKETT. Has the Senator perfected this part of section 10?

Mr. CARTER. I understand it is perfected so as to be accepted by the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment has not been stated by the Secretary. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 24, after the word "safeguards," it is proposed to strike out the words "and preferences."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In the same line, before the word "statute," it is proposed to insert the word "criminal."

Mr. BURKETT. I suggest it should be "the criminal," as I recollect the amendment.

Mr. CARTER. The word "the" should be inserted.

The SECRETARY. In line 24, before the word "statute," it is proposed to insert "the criminal;" and in the same line to strike out "statute" and insert "statutes," so as to read: "provided by the criminal statutes therefor."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question. What additional force does the provision of section 10, that these deposits of public money shall be safeguarded by the criminal statutes, confer? Are they not already safeguarded? If they are public funds, we have legislation which makes their wrongful use or diversion a criminal offense.

Mr. CARTER. It occurred to the Solicitor for the Post-Office Department that these funds were not, in legal contemplation, of the same character as the funds collected at the custom-houses and deposited in the Treasury.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, do I understand the Senator to say that we are to have two classes of public funds, each of them differing in character?

Mr. CARTER. The Senator does not desire to have two classes of public funds. The Solicitor for the Post-Office Department, however, after a rather exhaustive examination of the statutes, proposed this part of the section. It was originally presented to the committee by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and adopted by the committee, I think, through an excess of caution. But I feel disinclined, and I think the Senate would be, after the solicitor of the department had reached the conclusion that in some forced construction it might be held that the criminal statutes would not apply to employees embezzling or misappropriating these funds, as would be the case with funds collected at the custom-houses or by internal-revenue officers——

Mr. HEYBURN. After they are declared public funds, does the Senator think that embezzlement of them would not constitute a crime?

Mr. CARTER. This act proposes to declare them to be public funds.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does the Senator think that under existing law it would not be a crime to steal or embezzle this class of moneys declared to be public funds?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, the Senator well knows that there are certain statutes of the United States specifically applicable to employees of the Government of the United States and not applicable to persons outside of the public service. The public servant is held to a degree of accountability before the criminal law and maintains certain relations not generally applicable, and the purpose of this portion of the bill is to make it clear and unquestionable that these funds will have every safeguard thrown about any public funds by the laws of the country.

Mr. HEYBURN. The bill as it is proposed to be amended provides "that postal savings depository funds are hereby declared to be public moneys and subject to the safeguards provided by the criminal statutes therefor." That is provided by the criminal statutes, with relation to public funds. If the Senator proposes to make any other class of persons liable under the criminal law than those liable now—I suppose it might be suggested that the officers of banks may embezzle these funds, and they should be liable—it would be necessary to enact additional criminal law.

Mr. CARTER. I imagine the embezzling of these funds would subject such an individual to prosecution for larceny.

Mr. HEYBURN. Under existing law.

Mr. CARTER. Under existing law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Undoubtedly. Then, why incorporate this portion of the bill? Why not strike it out?

Mr. CARTER. I have clearly stated, or attempted to state, to the Senator that this section was imported into the bill at the request of the Post-Office Department——

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a pretty poor reason.

Mr. CARTER (continuing). Whose solicitor has after painstaking investigation concluded that as a matter of extra precaution and to prevent any question arising in the future as to these funds being public funds and entitled to the protection of all the statutes punishing the embezzlement or misappropriation of public funds, it would be better to incorporate it in the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it proper for us to incorporate in this bill a provision that does not meet with the approval of our judgment simply because the solicitor of some of the bureaus or departments of the Government wants it there?

Mr. CARTER. The fact that any question arises or exists upon the subject causes me as a Senator to approve the presence of the precautionary measure in the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. And yet the Senator agrees that the law already covers that question.

Mr. CARTER. The only question would be that of the general proposition as to whether these were public moneys.

Mr. HEYBURN. We declare them to be public moneys.

Mr. CARTER. We declare them to be public moneys; and I understand that is the portion of the bill to which the Senator objects.

Mr. HEYBURN. As I understand the Senator from Montana——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, we on the "strip" are being deprived of the advantage of this debate. I should be glad to hear what is going on.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was suggesting to the Senator from Montana that inasmuch as it seems to be admitted all around that under existing law the embezzlement or misdealing with these funds would subject a party to criminal prosecution, there is no occasion for reenacting existing law in this bill.

Mr. BURKETT. Let me call the attention of the Senator to section 16, on page 11 of the bill, which makes this section unnecessary, if it is calculated to have it go no further than what I understand the Senator in charge of the bill now to suggest. Section 16 provides:

All statutes relating to the embezzlement, conversion, and improper handling, retention, use, or disposal of postal and money order funds—

Shall be applicable to this law. It seems to me if it is intended to go no further than that, this language makes section 10 unnecessary.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly. If any further legislation were necessary, that would cover it. Originally section 10, in line 24, page 7, evidently was not to have any application whatever to the criminal statutes. The words "that postal savings depository funds are hereby declared to be public moneys, and subject to the safeguards and preferences provided by statute therefor" had no relation whatever and was not intended to relate to criminal proceedings, but to ordinary provisions of law relating to the disposal of this money and the control of it. I would inquire of the Senator from Montana if that is not the fact, and if it was not the intention that section 16 should provide the criminal remedy?

Mr. CARTER. It was the intention to leave no question anywhere as to this fund being subject to all the safeguards thrown about public funds by the criminal statutes. I eliminate that which relates to any kind of civil safeguard because of the desire of the Senator from Iowa to urge his amendment to section 11, where that question will be brought forward to be discussed on its merits.

The amendment I have just proposed, which has proved agreeable to the Senator from Iowa, disposes of this portion of section 10 in a satisfactory manner, unless the Senator can now urge some objection. Perchance we are too cautious with reference to safeguarding the money. In legislating I would rather err on the side of safety with reference to public funds than to omit anything necessary to guard them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. CARTER. I do not wish to discuss the matter further.

Mr. HEYBURN. I may possibly desire to discuss it a little further before voting on it.

Section 10, as amended upon the suggestion of the Senator from Montana, duplicates the provision of section 16. Section 16 provides:

All statutes relating to the embezzlement, conversion, and improper handling, retention, use, or disposal of postal and money-order funds—

Shall be applicable to this fund. That is a distinct provision in section 16. Section 10 undertakes to do the same thing in general terms, and I suggest that it is not a proper amendment, that it tends only to confuse the bill, and that the amendment should not be adopted. I refer to the amendment suggested in line 24, page 7, of the bill.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. PILES. How has the section been amended now? I did not quite catch it.

Mr. HEYBURN. It has been amended by striking out in line 24, first, the words "and preferences."

Mr. PILES. And what has been inserted?

Mr. HEYBURN. Nothing. And then by adding, after the word "by," in the same line, the words "the criminal."

Mr. PILES. How does it read now?

Mr. HEYBURN. As amended, it reads:

The postal savings depository funds are hereby declared to be public moneys and subject to the safeguards provided by the criminal statutes therefor.

Mr. PILES. Let me ask the Senator, does he see any objection to that?

Mr. HEYBURN. I see the same objection that I do in any legislation to duplicating the provisions of a bill.

Mr. PILES. Would it not be better, as the Senator from Montana suggested, in order to remove any doubt on that question, to let it go in? The point I desire to make, if the Senator will pardon me, is this: I should like to see this bill enacted into law at the present session of Congress, and I am going to contend for its enactment before this session adjourns; and if it is not enacted into law when it does adjourn, I am going to be one of the friends of the measure who will go to the President-elect and ask him to insert it in his call for the extra session of Congress, that the people may get what the Republican party promised in its national platform they would get.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does the Senator from Washington suppose that the insertion of this provision in any call for an extra or special session would have very much effect upon the legislative branch of this Government?

Mr. PILES. No; I do not. But I simply make the remark for this purpose: Inasmuch as there appears to be no serious objection to it, why not let it go in and thus expedite the bill? We could then proceed to the consideration of some other section. That is the only idea I have.

Mr. HEYBURN. A very ready answer to that is that I do not desire to expedite the enactment of this bill into a law.

Mr. PILES. That is a good explanation.

Mr. HEYBURN. And a perfectly candid one, too; and if I am to submit to what, in my judgment, is an inartistic provision in this bill merely in the interest of haste, I am afraid I will not meet the expectations of those who ask me to do so.

Mr. PILES. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not know he was opposed to this bill. I did not know he was opposed to the principle incorporated in this bill. Naturally there are some amendments that ought to be adopted, but I did not know the Senator from Idaho was opposed to the principle announced in the bill. I supposed he favored it. Otherwise I would not have made to him the suggestion I did.

Mr. HEYBURN. What the Senator calls "the principle"—I have forgotten the words the Senator used; I will say "the principle in this bill"—is rather an indefinite statement. I perhaps would interpret this legislation in one way and the Senator in another. I am not in favor of the enactment into law of a bill along the lines of this measure. Whether I would support another measure drawn upon a different basis is a question to be determined when that measure is before the Senate. I am directing my remarks and my objections to the bill under consideration.

Mr. PILES. Has the Senator any objection to the postal savings bank plan in principle?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am afraid the Senator from Washington was not present recently when I addressed the Senate upon this question. Had he been, I think there would have been no occasion to make the inquiry.

Mr. PILES. Possibly I was out of the Chamber when the Senator addressed the Senate on it. I am sure I missed a very rare treat, because I always enjoy everything the Senator says. I had up to this point thought he was in favor at least of the principle embodied in this bill; that is, the establishing throughout this country of postal savings banks, according to the national platform. I will not say that there may not be some amendments needed here. I myself think there are.

Mr. HEYBURN. I stated the other day, in the absence of the Senator from Washington, that I am not in the habit, in the light of my experience, of estimating the contents of a package by the label on the outside of it. It is easy enough to say, "Are you in favor of a postal savings bank bill?" and it is easy enough to reply, "Oh, yes, I am;" but it does not follow that you are in favor of this bill, because you might be in favor of another dealing with the same question. I am looking to the contents of this package. It is like a good many other questions presented to us in political platforms. They bear very attractive labels, but they are sawdust packages, and I am not going to be led astray or committed to this bill by any general statement in favor of this class of legislation by any platform.

Mr. PILES. I will ask the Senator if he will not kindly help those who favor this plan of establishing postal savings banks throughout the country to get this bill in some form——

Mr. HEYBURN. What plan?

Mr. PILES. So that we may enact the bill into law before this Congress adjourns?

Mr. HEYBURN. The words "establishing a postal savings bank system" convey no concrete or definite idea of what the Senator says the people want.

Mr. PILES. I think the people of this country want the Government of the United States to permit them to put their savings in the various post-offices of the United States. Now, does the Senator oppose that?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not the provision of this bill, unfortunately for the Senator's contention. This bill undertakes to provide that the Government shall borrow money of one man, at a given rate of interest, and loan it to another at a profit, and that it shall protect that money against attachment and taxation and every other liability to which the funds of the individual are subject under the law. Is that a postal savings bank bill? That is a banking bill. That is a bill to establish a new system of banking, whereby the Government will gather up the pennies of the poor and loan them to the rich.

Mr. PILES. Then, as I understand the Senator, he is opposed to the Government taking this money and paying any interest on it?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the way the Associated Press, I judge, sent out my statement the other day—I noticed it all over the country—cut in two. They sent out the first half of the sentence, and they kept the balance, which I presume is somewhere about the floor. I am not at their mercy, and I have the RECORD that I can appeal to here, and I do not propose to be half stated. I would rather be misstated, oftentimes.

I stated the other day, and I repeat it, I am opposed, under the pretense of establishing a postal savings bank, to the Government borrowing money from the people at a low rate of interest and loaning it to others of the people at a high rate of interest. They cut that in two just as the question of the Senator from Washington cut it in two.

Mr. PILES. Would the Senator oppose a bill which did not provide for the payment of interest to the depositor?

Mr. HEYBURN. Would I oppose it?

Mr. PILES. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Whether I would oppose it or support it would depend upon how it was drawn; what provisions it contained.

Mr. PILES. The particular point——

Mr. HEYBURN. Is there such a bill before the Senate?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. There would be no difficulty about this proposition and gentlemen would not be agitated if the Senate would adopt my plan of guaranteeing the deposits in our banks.

Mr. HEYBURN. This amounts to it.

Mr. NELSON. This is a quasi guaranty——

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Of the smaller depositors, and it is because you ignored my plan at the last session that the people hunger for this homeopathic dose.

Mr. HEYBURN. The proposition of the Senator was to guarantee all the deposits of depositors in national banks. The Senate did not seem to be ready at that time to adopt that view. Now they come in and ask that they may reach the same end by piecemeal and that the Government shall guarantee one class of deposits and not another.

Mr. NELSON. I will remind the Senator that that is not different from what pertains to the practice of medicine. Some prefer allopathy and some homeopathy.

Mr. HEYBURN. And some none.

Mr. NELSON. If we can get insurance of deposits in homeopathic doses, why should we not take it as a beginning? It may lead to something better. I know the Senator from Idaho is immensely anxious to help the people of this country. If we can guarantee the deposits of small depositors, these little fellows, in an indirect way, by having Uncle Sam stand back of their deposits, if we can make that beginning, may it not be the entering wedge by which we can get the banks to withdraw their objection to the general guaranty of deposits.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Idaho that Oklahoma has passed an act providing for the guaranty of deposits in state banks, which has resulted in the retirement of 33 national banks, and they have taken out state charters because of this advantage to the bank. The state banks have gained $12,000,000 in deposits and the national banks have lost two millions within the last twelve months under that system. In homeopathic doses it seems to be doing very well, and I want to commend it to the Senator from Idaho on that ground.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have had a watchful eye on the great State of Oklahoma for a number of years—even before it was a State. Its citizenship is composed of bright, energetic, restless men—men who went there because they were restless in their disposition. They were not satisfied with the conditions that surrounded them before they went there, and they are still of an inquiring mind. They are still inquiring whether there are not some substitutes for existing things in a good many ways. I am still watching them with interest. I want to see how they will work out that problem of state government upon which they have entered. My hope is with them. I have confidence in their integrity and good intentions. But we need more than the few months that have intervened since that great State was launched as one of the States of this Union in order to reach a safe, sound, and conservative judgment as to whether or not it is a successs.

Mr. President, this is exactly in the line of the legislation that we had under consideration at the last session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, which permitted the national banks of the United States to carry their reserves away from home and get them into the money centers; and that will be the result of this legislation if it is enacted into law.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator kindly explain how?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I certainly will not leave my thought unfinished. The bill provides that where there is not a market for this money in the vicinity of its deposit, it may be sent to other business centers for investment. In other words, we will assume that the bank at home first takes this money. It then becomes, of course, a part of the reserve which it carries. It will enable the bank either to send all of the private depositors' money abroad and keep this for the purpose of the bank or to send this abroad and keep the other. In other words, it enlarges not only the ability of the banks under existing law to send their reserves in a larger measure away from home, but it is a temptation for them to do it, because they pay a small rate of interest and they can send it where money is worth more. That proposition is in this bill, because by the direct terms of the bill this money, if it can not find a market at home, goes wherever it can find a market; and whose money is it? By the terms of the bill it is the Government's money. The ownership of the money shifts at the time of the deposit from the depositor to the Government of the United States. Where is it? In the Government Treasury? No; it does not go to the Government Treasury. It goes into the national banks, and it is still branded "public funds." It is still safeguarded, as it is expressed in section 10, notwithstanding the fact that it is not in the Treasury of the United States. The Government is keeping it in national banks. The national banks are keeping it where they please, or may, under the law, because there is no restriction in the bill as to where they may keep it.

The individuality or the identity of the money has been lost, by the very provision of section 10. It becomes public funds on general deposit. It is not on special deposit. There is no restriction as to what the bank may do with the money. There is no provision that it shall hold a certain amount in reserve to meet emergencies. There is none of those ordinary precautions at all that would stand between reckless banking and the safety of the depositor. If the Government is going to take this fund and be responsible for it, and pay it on demand, then the Government should protect it, at least to the extent that other deposits are now protected.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho whether it would not be entirely possible under this bill for the country banks to receive very large amounts of postal deposits and to turn them over to the great reserve banks, retaining in their own hands only 6 per cent to meet the demands of the Government in case those depositors should call upon the Government for their deposits?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, they are not even required to keep 6 per cent under this bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator will remember that the national banking act provides that the central reserve cities shall keep 25 per cent.

Mr. HEYBURN. But the Senator loses sight of the fact that these come under the character of government deposits and they do not carry any reserves against them. That was disclosed in the discussion of the question here in the Fifty-ninth Congress. They claim immunity from the responsibility of carrying reserves against government money. So they would not have to carry any reserves against these deposits.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator if under the bill, then, no reserves are required, is there any security that is required?

Mr. HEYBURN. No security is required. The provision on that subject is that—

> Such deposits shall be made in national banks in the States and Territories in which the funds are received, and when possible in the counties in which such funds are received.

There is no provision here requiring them to give security for these funds.

Mr. NEWLANDS. So they are not obliged either to give security or to keep any reserve.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not allow the Senator from Nevada to go away without some information on that subject.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is what I am seeking.

Mr. CUMMINS. The matter now under consideration is an amendment to the bill. Nevertheless, the original bill provided that the government deposits should be a first lien upon the resources of the bank. The amendment under consideration provides that the banks shall give an indemnifying bond to the satisfaction of the Government for the return of all moneys deposited by the Government in the bank. So the Senator from Idaho did not catch that part of the bill which does afford the Government real, substantial security for the money.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was directing my remarks to the bill. The immediate question under consideration was not the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho, although that is also under consideration. I was considering section 10 and the amendments which were accepted by the Senator from Montana.

The Senator from Iowa suggests the fact of making these deposits a first lien upon the assets of the bank. That does not constitute a guaranty. The bank is not required to have any assets. The bank may have disposed of every dollar of its funds.

It is true that the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa provides for the giving of an indemnifying bond, but the indemnifying bond would be given, I suppose, by the bank receiving deposits to the Government of the United States, so that the Government would be protected against loss at the hands of is own agency, the national bank. Would that constitute any protection to the depositor? The depositor needs no other protection than the Government itself. The Government of the United States receives this money. It becomes public funds, and the Government enters the credit in a book; the depositor presents that pass book, and of course the Government will pay him. He needs no other guaranty than the faith and the ability of the Government.

But I was directing my remarks more to the other depositors of the bank than those who deposit under the provisions of the bill. A bank has a million dollars in deposits from merchants and business men in a community. You are going to take away from those men the security that rests in the fact that the assets of the bank are responsible to them against loss. You are going to deprive them of that right. You are going to protect this single class of depositors at the expense of whom? The bank? No. The Government? No. You are going to protect this class of depositors at the expense of the general depositors in the bank. If a bank with a million dollars of general deposits had $500,000 of this class of deposits were to fail or become insolvent and had $500,000 of assets, the Government would take those assets to do what? To protect the depositors in the postal savings bank? No; he is already protected. But to protect the Government itself. Then, what would become of the million dollars belonging to depositors doing business in the ordinary way with that bank? Those depositors would not be left to share in these assets at all. The Government would have recouped itself against loss, and the general business community doing business with the bank would be out and injured.

No amendment offered to the bill, nothing in the provisions of the bill, seems to take into account the position of the ordinary class of depositors. Are we going to diminish their security in the interest of those who to-day are said to be so timid that they will not bring the money out of the hiding places? As an inducement to bring money out of supposed hiding places are we going to destroy the credit of the bank and the security of those who do business with it in the ordinary responsible methods? I would hardly see any necessity for that.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKETT. Does the Senator know that an amendment pending provides for just the things the Senator is now speaking of?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator from Nebraska overlooks the fact that there are two amendments pending. This amendment is separable. The Senator in charge of the bill undertook to accept the amendment proposed on line 24 of page 7 in section 10. That was the point which brought me to my feet. I have not undertaken to discuss the amendment of the Senator from Iowa in its general terms. We have not reached it, and I have not realized the necessity of doing so. We will reach it; we must reach it.

Mr. BURKETT. The real thing that was up for discussion at the time was the first few lines of section 10, providing that this deposit fund should be public money, and providing that it should be public money, subject to the criminal statute. The Senator took issue because he said section 16 practically covered the same thing. That was the real amendment which was being considered at that time. The other part of the amendment, to which the remarks of the Senator are now directed, was not under immediate consideration at that time.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I were in court arguing a demurrer, I would be subject to the rule suggested by the Senator from Nebraska; but we are in a higher court than those in which such questions are raised by the technical rules of pleading, and we are discussing this measure a little along the lines suggested by the now absent Senator from Washington. We are discussing this question as a political principle.

Mr. BURKETT. My object in interrupting the Senator was to find if we could not discuss it in a way by which we would finally reach an end and accomplish something.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am very anxious, of course, to accommodate the Senator.

Mr. BURKETT. I am anxious to have the amendments acted upon, and we should consider one amendment at a time. If we considered one amendment at a time and discussed it, we might get something accomplished at this session; but it will not be possible otherwise.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think we will get to a point where we will have a clear comprehension of the spirit and purpose of this proposed legislation. That is what I am hoping, and if we do not reach that point, as far as I am concerned, it will not be for want of careful inquiry and consideration.

Of course it would be very nice indeed to just push a bill like this through and say we promised something in the platform, and we must hurry and do it or somebody will be calling us to account. I do not stand in any fear of being called to account by the public or any part of the public for my action in this body. I propose that it shall be a conscientious discharge of my duty, and I stand ready to give a reason anywhere for my action and for the faith that dictates it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Was not the Senator from Idaho a delegate to this convention that approved the postal savings bank system?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator says "this convention" that approved a postal savings bank bill. Inasmuch as the Senator has asked me the question, I will make my position so plain that there will be no future cause for inquiry.

Mr. CARTER. I asked the Senator if he was a delegate to the convention.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will answer the question. It is the privilege of the Senator to ask a question, and it is my privilege to answer it. Each of us choose phrases according to our fancy. I will answer it whenever I am given the opportunity.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I want to remind the Senator from Idaho that he is not obliged to incriminate himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is just these little pleasantries interjected into the proceedings of this body that afford us rest.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. Can the Senator from Idaho confess that he was a member of that convention without incriminating himself?

Mr. HEYBURN. We will let that answer, Mr. President, come along in due time. I think I have been sitting in party councils as long as, or perhaps a little longer, than the Senator from Montana. I have at all times since I first entered upon the responsible duties of citizenship given heed to the good faith that rests upon a party and its responsibilities. I have never engaged or participated in the making of a platform that expressed principles I did not adhere to and live up to. The making, as I have said, in the Chicago convention of a declaration in favor of the enactment of a proper law establishing postal savings banks did not carry with it the promise or the responsibility to adopt any legislation upon that subject that might be proposed by anybody.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator——

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me anticipate the Senator for a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Does the Senator admit that he was a member of that convention?

Mr. HEYBURN. I was not a member of the convention, but it was a convention of the party that I belong to.

Mr. CARTER. Since the Senator believes in executing the purposes of the party as announced, and the party announced itself in favor of a postal savings banks system, I ask him if he can outline what he understands by a postal savings banks system such as he would support?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, I can; and perhaps I may do so before the consideration of this question leaves the Senate, but I am not obliged to do it every time I get on my feet to discuss the pending bill.

Mr. President, we had a glimpse at this proposed legislation before we went to our respective conventions.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest to the Senator that perhaps his platform was made to get in on rather than to stand on.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not concede that political principle. I believe in an intelligent political conscience, and I believe in the right of all men to speak responsibly for their party and to have a patient and careful hearing as to the interpretation that they place upon those promises.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield in just a moment. As I have already said, the declaration in the Chicago platform, or any other platform upon this subject, was merely a label, and it behooves us to fill the package with gold and not with sawdust.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKETT. I am sure that the platform did not specify just how the bill should be drawn, but does not the Senator recall that at that time this very bill was pending in the Senate, and before the meeting of the convention this very bill had been set down for a day certain for consideration? This was the bill that committee of the Senate had reported, and it must have been the bill the convention had in mind when they indorsed the proposition, if they had any bill in mind. Furthermore——

Mr. HEYBURN. The indorsement had no responsibility behind it at all and our indorsement has.

Mr. BURKETT. Furthermore, if there had been no bill so that it could not have been brought to a close interpretation, would not the Senator suppose a general interpretation of postal savings bank, as shown by fifty years of practical experience in the rest of the world, would mean to convey what was intended by the words "postal savings bank" when they indorsed it?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would not arrive at any such conclusion, Mr. President.

Mr. BURKETT. Would the Senator expect, then, that the convention in saying that they indorsed the postal savings system were indorsing a system entirely different from the general system as announced in this bill, and entirely different from the system of all the world as shown by fifty years of experience and the practice of practically every other nation? Would the Senator suppose the convention intended to indorse something entirely different from all of them?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if the convention acted intelligently, and I have no doubt it did, it simply recommended the subject to us for intelligent and responsible legislation; that is all.

Perhaps planks in platforms are sometimes framed in unfortunate language; they undertake to command and direct. There is no political convention that has a right to direct the act of a Senator under his conscience in this body. That a committee which meets and sits for four or five hours at nighttime, without any instruction from any constituency and without any responsibility for their act, is to dictate the conscience of a Senator is not to be thought of for a minute. The conscience that impels us to take the oath of office and assume the duties here is the only measure of legislation or action on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKETT. Recognizing, as the Senator has finally done, that the convention at most only commanded this body to enact some responsible legislation, if I remember the Senator's words, does he think he is even complying with the instruction and command of his convention when he stands here and opposes the proposed legislation?

Mr. HEYBURN. I take no instruction or command from any convention on earth except as to general principles of government. I know when I go into a national convention what the principles of the party to which I belong are, and I do not have to relearn them every time I go there. That they should assume to say that the Senator from Nebraska or the Senator from Idaho shall vote so and so is beyond their province.

Mr. BURKETT. Then, what is the object of a party platform?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is the declaration of the general principles of a party on political questions and not upon questions of detail in legislation.

Mr. BURKETT. Is the Senator carrying it out when he makes the statement that he is going to prevent a vote on the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I am absolutely carrying it out. Let me ask the Senator a question. Does the Senator from Nebraska expect to offer any amendments or to vote for any amendments to the Carter bill as it came here?

Mr. BURKETT. I certainly will if they are good ones.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, is not the Senator disregarding just as much as I, there being only a difference in measure, what he calls the dictates of that convention?

Mr. BURKETT. I understood the Senator to say that he proposes to prevent us from getting a vote on the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I did not say that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have just come into the Chamber, but I think I catch the drift of the discussion. I have heard a great deal of talk about conventions, state and national, binding the conscience of the members of the party. I will remind the Senator from Idaho that only a few years ago I chanced to be a member of the committee on resolutions of a national convention when the Republican party was committed to 1 cent postage in the platform. I presume that if a bill establishing 1 cent postage had been offered in this body it might have received a vote or two, but it would not have been seriously considered; and yet it was a part of the platform of the party to which the Senator and I belong.

Mr. BACON. In other words, it was simply put in there to catch votes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think probably that was the purpose. I voted against it, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not willing to admit that at all. I have a conscientious respect and regard for the declarations of a platform. I have served on a committee on platforms in the national convention three or four times, and I have served more than once on the subcommittee that did the responsible work in the making of the platform and I know something of the manner in which platforms are made. I have never felt that I was released from responsibility at all when I left the convention and when the platform went out as a declaration of principles. Platforms sometimes are not wisely drawn and they undertake to go beyond the province of the convention in entering into details. A platform is a declaration of the principles of the party and is not to direct the responsible representatives of the people in the details of carrying those principles into effect.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKETT. Right in line there, what provisions did the Senator, as the working member of the platform committee, put in platforms that were not put in with the intention of carrying them out?

Mr. HEYBURN. None at all. I never voted to put a plank in a platform or to make a declaration that was intended merely for use in the campaign, as has been suggested, or that I did not seriously believe to be the fundamental and foundation principles upon which our Government should rest, and I never expect to. I never believed in the doctrine that platforms were made to ride into power on. I believe a platform should be a declaration of the principles the party stands for. I believe one of the most serious duties men perform is the declaration of the principles of a party, and I think sometimes we forget it in the elaborateness of the platform.

Mr. BURKETT. I understood the Senator to say a moment ago that he was not a delegate to the last convention. Is he, then, taking this position because he does not himself feel personally bound by that declaration in the platform?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am taking the position because I do not approve the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BURKETT. Does the Senator take this position from the fact that he was not a party to the convention?

Mr. HEYBURN. Not at all.

Mr. BURKETT. And did not help make the platform?

Mr. HEYBURN. Not at all.

Mr. BURKETT. That does not lessen the obligation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not at all. I am opposing the enactment of this proposed measure because I do not believe that its enactment would be in conformity with the best interests of the people.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have been out of the Chamber, but I came in in time enough to catch a little of what is going on. I should like to inquire whether or not the Carter bill, or the bill under consideration, is one of the planks in the Republican platform?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not.

Mr. TILLMAN. Or whether the general subject of postal savings banks, without designating any bill or without going into particulars, was a part of the Republican scheme?

Mr. HEYBURN. The latter statement of the Senator is the correct one. The Carter bill is no part of the Republican platform.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought from what the Senator from Nebraska said that it was a part, verbatim et literatim, of the Republican platform.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was to that purpose I asked the Senator if he intended to vote for or to propose any amendments, because it would be as much treason to the party, from the standpoint the Senator suggested, to propose to amend the bill or to vote for amendments as it would be to oppose the bill.

Mr. President, I do not believe that I stand alone in my opposition to this measure. I shall be very much interested to hear developed the position of other Senators on this question. I have taken part in the discussion of it thus early because there seemed to be no one else to stand in the breach against hasty action on the bill. Amendments were being made here by the Senator in charge of the bill, without any considerable consideration by the Members of the Senate.

Mr. President, this is an attempt to establish a new branch of the Government that will represent an increase in the clerical force of the Government in the neighborhood of 40,000 people. An accurate estimate at this time is not possible, but it is not difficult to double the number of postmasters in the United States and add to that a force of admittedly eighteen hundred clerks in the city of Washington. Like some other recent grafts upon the body politic, we will soon have a new department here, for which we will be making appropriations from year to year.

I discussed the necessity of this measure on a former occasion, and I do not care at this time to enter largely into the consideration of that question. But this is one of those hysterical cries that come up from time to time, and that people without investigating them accept as though they had a value.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the hysteria has considerably exceeded a century in duration and has been crystallized into very important legislation all over the world except here; but passing hysteria, I do not wish to leave unchallenged the wholly unauthorized statement of the Senator from Idaho that the bill will necessitate the employment of 40,000 additional people, nor the statement that it will draw one dollar from the Treasury of the United States for the execution of its purposes. The fact is that not one additional postmaster will be required in the United States for the administration of this law; not one additional post-office will be established in consequence of the law; not one additional clerk in a post-office in the country will be employed in consequence of the law; and only a limited clerical force at the capital will be required to compute the interest annually on the deposits as the books come in.

Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Idaho desires to be fair and just in his statement of the subject before him, but in the enthusiasm of the moment he seems inclined to deal in reckless statements which I think he will feel impelled to correct when they appear in the RECORD.

Mr. HEYBURN. I call upon the Senator from Montana to name a statement that he thinks I shall be called upon to correct.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator has just made a statement that it will be necessary to have 40,000 additional postmasters in the United States if this bill be enacted.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. CARTER. I hope the Senator will correct that.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope the Senator will be just as careful as he suggests I should be. I did not say that we should need 40,000 additional postmasters. I said double the number of postmasters. I do not know their number.

Mr. CARTER. There are 76,000 postmasters in the United States now, and that makes the Senator's expression even more extravagant.

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well. That is one of my objections to the system.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator explain how an additional postmaster can be appointed under this proposed law?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I care not whether you call him a postmaster or a postmaster's clerk, or an assistant, or a financial clerk, or what you call him, it is the man who is going to take the money in and enter the amount on the books, transfer it to the government accounts, and transfer the money to the bank. The posmaster can not do it without some additional help in any post-office.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Post-Office Department, which is charged with the administration of this great service, has made very accurate computations, has considered the operation of this bill should it become a law, and the judgment of that department, familiar with the subject-matter, should certainly be accepted in preference to the statement of the Senator, which was 40,000 off to begin with, and he made it 76,000 off in trying to correct the statement.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I did not make it; the Senator did.

Mr. President, has it occurred to the Senator that, instead of sitting here day after day and depriving ourselves of the benefit of exercise and the enjoyment of outside life, we might just as well send over and have the Post-Office Department legislate for us and announce the result and we should have it filed here? I, for one, do not propose to take the action of the Post-Office Department as conclusive upon myself.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Idaho does not understand me to request him to subordinate his judgment to anybody or to any department. That request I would not prefer, and it would be futile to prefer it if I were so disposed.

Mr. HEYBURN. It certainly would.

Mr. CARTER. There was no intention of having the Senator from Idaho either terrorized or coerced by the suggestion; but I assume that the Senator will assent to the fact that those who know something about the subject——

Mr. HEYBURN. "Who know."

Mr. CARTER. Are better able to judge than those who know nothing about it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but who is it that knows, Mr. President? I want to know who is to be accepted as knowing something which somebody else does not know?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I realize the great learning of the Senator from Idaho in law, in the history of his country, and in the broad domain of general information; but he has demonstrated to my satisfaction, and I think to everybody's satisfaction here this afternoon, that he does not know anything about this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. CARTER. When the Senator makes the statement deliberately that this bill will entail the appointment of 40,000 additional postmasters, and then says, in correcting himself, that it will only require a duplication of existing postmasters, and they are seventy-odd thousand in number, I submit he admits himself out of court so far as any information on this bill or its operation is concerned.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is a fortunate thing that in this deliberate body we have an accurate record, which is official, and that we are not at the mercy of the statement of any man as to what we say. Of course the RECORD will not bear out the Senator from Montana in any such conclusion, and when he reads it to-morrow, if he does, he will be surprised that he should have been led into making such a statement.

Mr. CARTER. I hope the Senator will agree not to correct the RECORD.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, Mr. President, I am one of those who never correct the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, nor read a speech after I have made it until it is in print. No reporter of this body will ever say that the print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not as I uttered it on the floor of the Senate on any occasion.

Mr. President, what I said was true, in my judgment, that this bill would double the force, or make it necessary to double the force—I care not whether you call it of postmasters or not—in the post-offices; and that it would add largely to the clerical force in Washington to take care of this continuous and enormous daily stream of business coming in from, as I understood the Senator to say, 70,000 post-offices to this great center to be converted into book accounts. How many accountants and how many bookkeepers would be required here to take care of the flow of items that would come in every day—not once a month or once in a given period, but every day—flowing in here to be tabulated, adjusted, posted, and recorded; and not only coming in, but going out again?

I care very little, so far as the discussion of this principle is concerned, about the question that will probably be more interesting to the Appropriations Committee some day, but I want to reply to the suggestion the Senator wrapped up in the body of his remarks, and which seems to me to be utterly without reason. The Senator says, first, that it will require no additional help at the post-offices, and he charges me with being absolutely lacking in knowledge because I suggest that, in my judgment, a large increase in the post-offices will be necessary. Then he says not an additional clerk in any post-office will be required by this proposed act. I leave that to the judgment of people who think. He admits that some additional clerical force will be necessary here in Washington for the posting up of these accounts. That situation does not need any very great amount of elaboration.

Mr. CARTER. I can elaborate it somewhat for the Senator's information, if he desires it at this moment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am always ready to yield, and pleased to yield, to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it will be observed by an examination of the terms of the bill that it will only provide for postal depositories in the money-order post-offices.

Mr. HEYBURN. How many are there?

Mr. CARTER. About 39,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is what I had in my mind when I made the suggestion as to the number of additional officers in the post-offices.

Mr. CARTER. There are altogether about 76,000 post-offices in the country. Of those 76,000 post-offices probably 39,000 are money-order offices. In each money-order office of the country is a money-order clerk assigned to the duty of looking after the money-order business.

Mr. President, it is well known that such clerks are not employed on an average in a money-order office to exceed two hours in a day, all told. In some of the larger offices there is a larger clerical force employed looking after the money-order business, but the computations made by the department—and without being at all frightened by the suggestion that we are subordinating our judgment to that of a department, I think it may well befit us to consult the experience of those who have been administering the department for years and who are familiar with its operations—the computations made by the department result in assurances given the committee to the effect that no additional clerical force will be necessary throughout the country to operate these postal savings depositories in the post-offices. That eliminates at once the increase contemplated by the Senator in the 39,000 money-order offices. There will be, of course, a number of clerks required at the capital to compute interest, to keep the books, to send notices to depositors, and all that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does it not occur to the Senator from Montana that there must be a great deal of idle time on the hands of the existing clerks and officers in the post-offices if they can take charge of this immense business without burdening them?

Mr. CARTER. The department thinks there is ample time now for the clerks to do the additional business without any cost to the Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. In regard to the question of the overpowering influence of the opinion of executive officers, I would not detract from any credit that is due to them either for their efficiency in the performance of their executive duties or in their judgment regarding public questions. I suppose they vary in their ability just as the great body of citizenship varies. I do not suppose you add anything to the intelligence of a man by making him an officer in the Post-Office Department of the United States. I might be willing to attach much importance to his judgment had I a personal acquaintance with him that would enable me to properly estimate him, but because an officer in the executive branch of this Government feels like exploiting the fields of legislation and impressing his name upon the history of the country by sending in a bill that is known as the bill of this certain officer, I do not propose to blindly follow any such lead. I do not know of any experience that such an officer has had that would justify any Member of this body in deferring his own judgment to that of such a man.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, to whom does the Senator refer?

Mr. HEYBURN. I refer to whomsoever I mention. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Idaho would convey the impression—not consciously, of course—that this bill had evolved from a period of hysteria and that the hysteria was of recent origin.

Mr. HEYBURN. Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, this postal savings bank legislation has been earnestly urged by the Postmasters-General of the United States from 1871 to this time. Time and again the officers of the Post-Office Department have forwarded drafts of bills to cover the subject in mind. Members of both Houses of Congress have introduced bill after bill in session after session, and report after report has been made in favor of such bills in both Houses of Congress in the forty years past.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a word there—and been repudiated by the intelligence of the American people.

Mr. CARTER. Ah, Mr. President, that is the view of the Senator expressed on the floor, but the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads years ago, after mature consideration, reported a bill substantially in terms like unto the one here pending.

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to ask a question there——

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, with reference to repudiation, after this subject-matter had been pressed upon the attention of the American people year after year from 1871, after numerous bills had been put forward embodying the administrative and other features, the people became, in due time, pretty fairly familiar with the matter. They were familiar with the history of the world; they knew that there were postal savings banks in practically every civilized country on the globe, and that they were all working well. So last year, in every national convention that assembled on this continent, postal savings banks were approved as a safe, sane, and worthy system to be legislated upon and put upon the statute books of the country.

Mr. HEYBURN. What kind of savings banks?

Mr. CARTER. Unquestionably the kind of savings banks that had been put forward by various bills and reports and discussions and editorials, magazine articles, and other forms of expression through which the people of the country arrive at a conclusion.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does the Senator undertake to say that the bills put forth by the newspapers were like those put forth by the magazines, and that those put forth by the magazines were like those put forth by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and so on, and so on? Not any two of them had the same idea about it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the underlying idea of each and every one was substantially the same. They only differed in details.

Mr. HEYBURN. There never has been a bill reported into the Senate in all the years to which the Senator refers that met with the approval of this body, or, presumably, that met with the approval of the country, because the country sends this body here.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator will now agree to take a vote on this bill within a week, I will show him that two-thirds of the Senate favor its passage.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am afraid the Senator from Montana does not give full credit—I will not say to the intelligence, but to the judicious action of this body.

Mr. CARTER. In order that he may be better informed and I may be better informed as to how the Senate stands on it, will the Senator now consent to take a vote on this bill and pending amendments on the 20th day of this month?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, by that time I hope this bill will bear but little resemblance to its present form.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator consent to have a vote taken at any time during the session on the bill and pending amendments?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will not say that it is not the privilege of the Senator to ask that question, but I will say that at this time it is my privilege to say that I have not fully considered this measure or fully discussed it. I have, perhaps, fully considered this bill, but I have not fully considered the question of a postal savings bank system.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I do not wish at this time to ask unanimous consent for a time to take a vote; but I will prefer such a request before the close of this week, when Senators who have an interest in the subject are present. I hope the Senator from Idaho will exert himself to secure unanimous consent for a vote at this session, and I assure him that a majority of the Senate equal to two-thirds will sustain the peculiar view which he assumes to criticise.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have sometimes thought that I could prophesy as to just how a vote would stand in this body and have been woefully disappointed with the result.

I do not intend to be in the position of one who "filibusters," as it is termed, in regard to this bill at all, but I do intend to try to prevent unwise legislation by legitimate means. I shall not speak one word or one moment longer than I think is proper to speak upon this measure; but I will not at this time promise that I will do something that was perhaps the evil that was committed by the conventions that have been referred to, and which they promised to do without sufficient thought as to the result of their promise.

Mr. President, the wisdom, very much extolled by the Senator from Montana, of former Postmasters-General does not appeal to me at all. I care more for the wisdom of this hour and this age, because it is with this hour and this age that the responsibility rests. It may be that in the past measures have been proposed for the establishment of postal savings banks that would come nearer meeting with my approval than the bill under consideration could possibly ever do; but I have not felt it profitable to take them up for consideration. Certain it is that I am not in favor of any bill that is based upon the principle that the Government shall borrow money of one man in order that it may loan it to another selected person. That does not appeal to me; and if I can prevent any such legislation as that, I will feel that I have contributed to the welfare of the country.

I will not support a measure that provides for the turning over of deposits of this character to banks of a particular class, to be by them loaned out or disposed of or controlled. I will support a measure, aptly drawn and phrased, that provides for the deposit of sums of money through the post-offices or a central bank and its agencies, to be kept by the Government for those who have not confidence enough in their own ability to keep it, until the owner of the money wants it; but I would provide that the character of the money shall change, and that it shall become a public fund. I will not, however, support any such measure as this.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKETT. I do not understand the character of bill which the Senator now says he would support. Is it a bill providing banks for incompetents?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know just exactly where the Senator's failure to understand commences.

Mr. BURKETT. For the last three or four minutes we over on this side have been unable to understand——

Mr. HEYBURN. I am afraid that the conversation of the Senator was occupying his mind to the exclusion of hearing what I said.

Mr. BURKETT. The Senator was not engaged in any conversation.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will repeat——

Mr. BURKETT. I should like to know just the kind of postal savings banks the Senator was saying he is willing to support.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will repeat what I said at the expense of the public printing bill. I will support a system which provides that those who feel that they are not capable of safely guarding their own money, whether they be rich or poor, may deposit it with the Government of the United States, through agencies, either the post-offices or a central bank and its branches, and that the Government will keep the money of these incompetents until such time as they feel that they want to use it.

Mr. BURKETT. Would the Senator want any further statement or affidavit to that effect on the part of the depositor than the mere fact of depositing the money in the bank would be?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, that designation is my own, and I would not require any other person to adopt it. I never saw public sentiment, represented by those who are pressing the passage of this bill, so wrought up on behalf of a class of their fellow-citizens who have not been consulted in this matter. Has any Senator, has any man anywhere, ever been appealed to by anyone who had money in a teapot to provide him some safe place for it?

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKETT. Let me ask the Senator if he ever heard of a heathen appealing to anybody for a Bible?

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not catch the Senator's remark.

Mr. BURKETT. I asked the Senator if he ever heard of any heathen country appealing for Bibles; and yet all the time we are sending Bibles and missionaries to countries that do not have Bibles and missionaries.

Mr. HEYBURN. With due respect to the Senator from Nebraska, I think I will not undertake to answer a question like that. I will leave that to the Senator to answer himself on some memorial day.

Mr. BURKETT. Let me remind the Senator that he asked the question whether any Senator here who was advocating this bill had ever had any appeal from anybody for a depository of this kind. Simply because the people who need savings bank depositories have not appealed for them is not, to my mind, any answer that there is not a just field for them. Compulsory school laws have been passed perhaps in his State and in mine for the benefit of a class of people that never appealed for a compulsory school law; but we have enacted such laws for their good. So we may enact this bill for a class of people who do not save their money, who do not know how to save, and who are spendthrifts. The Senator certainly would not expect us to sit here and wait until the class of people whom he has been describing come to Congress and appeal for the enactment of the legislation now proposed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, there is no analogy at all between the case stated by the Senator and the one under consideration. We devote a good deal of time to constituting ourselves the guardians of those who need no guardians. Recently my attention was drawn to a statement, in writing or printing, suggesting that the great mass of the American people needed the services of a volunteer guardian; that some one ought to intrude himself into their households and teach their children manners; that some one, a self-constituted guardian, ought to invade the family, so as to control the disposition and the raising of the children. I have no sympathy with that. One man in this country is the equal of another, so far as his right to regulate his own conduct and the conduct of those for whom he is responsible is concerned. Such people seem to forget the quality of the citizenship of this country. They seem to think that this is a government to be governed only by what they term "the good." The rights of those they term "the bad" are just the same as the rights of those they term "the good." A person of responsible age has a right to keep his money in his own possession, and, in my judgment, it tends to a higher grade of prosperity, a quicker response to opportunity, than when the money is in the bank, on the down slide to the financial centers of speculation.

I like to feel that the community in which I live have their accumulated money in their own grasp, and that it is not subject to the control or the negative shake of the head of a bank cashier. I like to feel that they are enjoying the rights of citizenship—the control of their own property. We sit here and talk about these things as though we were the guardians of people who perhaps understand the Government as well as we do. All the intelligence and the integrity of the American people are not in legislative halls.

There have been as wise and capable figures outside of Congress dealing with this question as there have been in Congress. All of the ability to deal wisely with this question has not been at the head of the Post-Office Department. They are capable gentlemen—men for whom I have the respect that men are entitled to have. They come and go. They are Postmaster-General for a week or two or six months or two or three years. They did not grow up in the business, and I doubt if they have given more attention to the question than Senators on this floor who are participating in its discussion. Why should we look to them for counsel and advice in this matter? What is there in the enumeration of our duties and responsibilities that would justify us in looking to them for the wisdom to guide us in this matter.

Mr. President, so long as my voice or my vote can prevent it there will be no addition to the existing banking system of the United States based upon the principle that it is to be the king pin of the whole financial system, and that it shall have a preferential right in every settlement and adjustment of difficulties over the people who deposit in the banks. I would give no man in this country a superior right to another in any respect. If he puts his money in a bank, he should have exactly the same right and be subjected to the same risk as another. What! Are you going to give the miser a superior claim as against a merchant in distributing the assets of a bank? I think not. Are these people whose guardians you are going to become so meritorious that they shall have any preferential rights as against the candid, open, responsible business world? I think not. The fact is, with all the enumeration of the men and the bodies of men who have considered this question, there has not been recited a single instance of special qualifications on the part of any man whose judgment is relied on.

I would rather take the judgment of the Senator from Montana than the judgment of any man who ever occupied the position of Postmaster-General of the United States, and I would rather take the judgment of the Senate of the United States than the judgment of any body of men in the world upon this question. But we will have to bow to the judgment of the Congress of the United States, because the Congress of the United States is the United States Government.

Mr. President, why should we protect the deposits of this class of undesirable citizens—because if the charges against them are sustained that is what they are? Why should we make their deposits sacred from taxation? Why should we exempt them from their liability to attachment, to execution under the law? Why should we protect the deposits of this undesirable class of citizens from whom we are to wrest their savings and take possession of them as their guardians? Why should we give them special favors and benefits under the law by exempting their deposits from taxation and liability to attachment and the other things from which they are exempted? Why do we not exempt the money of the man who is doing business and adding to the prosperity of the country, if we are going to exempt anybody? I am not in favor of exempting any man's money from the burdens and the responsibility which the law places upon it. But I certainly am not going to vote for any bill that proposes to exempt this fund, real or imaginary—and no man knows how much of it is real and how much of it is imaginary—from the burdens that other men's property bear, in response, if I may be permitted to say, although it is not very parliamentary, to a half-baked sentiment.

I will not slander the Congress by saying we have in the past or will in the future give the country unwise legislation for want of intelligent consideration; but I feel justified in uttering a warning against it on this occasion because of the urgent, persistent demand that a vote shall be taken to-day on this bill or some amendment to it.

The amendment the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] offers, which provides for the striking out of section 10 and inserting a new section 10 in place of section 11, raises an entirely new question and presents an entirely different system. There are some features of it which would commend themselves to me if they were not coupled with the general plan of borrowing one man's money to loan it to another.

I understand the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] desires to move an executive session.

Mr. CULLOM. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is of the impression that the ayes have it.

Mr. BURKETT. A division, Mr. President.

Mr. CULLOM. I will say to Senators that no treaty is to be taken up, if that is the objection.

The question was put; and there were on a division—ayes 18, noes 9, no quorum voting.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask for a call of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ankeny	Crane	Guggenheim	Page

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question recurs on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. BURKETT and Mr. CARTER demanded a division; and the Senate proceeded to divide.

Mr. BURKETT. We may as well have the yeas and nays.

Mr. CULLOM. If there is any trouble about the matter, I will withdraw the motion. There is very little to be done in executive session, but some Senators wish to have certain nominations acted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator insist upon his motion or does he withdraw it?

Mr. CULLOM. I insist upon it, in view of the statement I have made, and I will let the Senate determine the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary called the roll, and the result was announced—yeas 39, nays 16, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of unobjected pension bills upon the calendar and that no other business be transacted during the remainder of the day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (H. R. 26746) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 2, after line 11, to strike out:

The name of Will P. Hall, late of Company I, Seventeenth Regiment U. S. Infantry, war with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twelve," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Albert Werner, late of Battery N, First Regiment U. S. Artillery, war with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to amend the bill, on page 4, line 3, by striking out the word "sixteen," before "dollars," and inserting "thirty," so as to read:

The name of Dennis Driscoll, late of Troop I, Second Regiment U. S. Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

Mr. Driscoll's service was of a very hard nature and very valuable to the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will agree to be satisfied with a pension of $24 a month, I will consent to that raise. While it was rather hard service, he was not in the civil war, and we do make a distinction in the amounts that are granted to veterans of the civil war over and above those who enlisted a considerable time afterwards.

Mr. WARREN. Of course I know what the Senator says must be true. This man was in 46 Indian battles within the first six months of his service. If it is true that $24 is as much as can be allowed under the circumstances, I shall accept that modification of the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming, as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This seems to complete the pension bills on the calendar.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. I withdraw the motion for a moment.

CENTENARY OF THE BIRTH OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Several days ago House joint resolution 247, relating to the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, and making the 12th day of February, 1909, a legal holiday, and for other purposes, was passed by the Senate. The joint resolution was amended in the Senate by inserting a provision in regard to a memorial road to Gettysburg. I am not officially advised, but I understand that amendment has not been and will not be agreed to by the House. If I am in order, I desire to move to recall the joint resolution from the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The understanding was that no business should be considered except unobjected pension bills. The Chair is of the opinion that a motion such as the Senator from Oklahoma desires to make would be in contravention of the understanding.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that under the unanimous-consent agreement nothing can be considered except the pension bills.

Mr. GORE. Very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 11, 1909, at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, offered the following prayer:

Infinite and Eternal Spirit, never very far from any of us, we would draw near to Thee after the manner of the world's great Exemplar that we may receive abundantly that life which quickens, enobles, and enlarges the soul's capacity for righteousness, truth, justice, honesty, and integrity.

We thank Thee for the object lesson which will be afforded the world here to-day of American honesty and integrity in the selection of a President and Vice-President of our Republic. Let Thy richest blessings descend upon those who shall be selected, that they may honor their respective offices by a wise, faithful, and efficient service to their country, and we will ascribe all praise to Thee, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever and ever. ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of House joint resolution 254, creating a commission to recommend a design and site for a monument or monumental memorial to Abraham Lincoln, and for other purposes, and consider the same in the House at this time, which House joint resolution I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 254.

Resolved, etc., That the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of War, the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Buildin gand Grounds; Daniel S. Burnham, of Evanston, Ill.; Charles F. McKim and John M. Carrere, both of New York City, be, and they hereby are, created a commission to prepare, or approve of, a general design for a monument or monumental memorial to be erected to Abraham Lincoln in the city of Washington, said monument or monumental memorial to cost, exclusive of the site, about, but not exceeding, the sum of $1,250,000, and to consider the selection of a suitable site for said monument or monumental memorial; and that the said commission report to Congress on the first Monday in December, 1909, concerning the design and the site for such monument or monumental memorial.

SEC. 2. That to enable the commission to carry out the purposes of this act, the expenditure of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized. The members of the said commission shall serve without compensation, but shall be paid their necessary traveling expenses; and disbursements made under this act shall be made by the Secretary of the Interior on vouchers approved by the Superintendent of the United States Capitol Building and Grounds as the appropriations for the Capitol building are approved and disbursed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] if he receives unanimous consent for the consideration of this resolution, he proposes to allow debate on it and amendment?

Mr. MCCALL. Well, Mr. Speaker, the matter would scarcely be in my control to that extent. I would say that this resolution has the simple purpose of creating a commission for the purpose of taking preliminary steps which may result in erecting in the city of Washington a monument to Abraham Lincoln. It does not involve the question whether some highway or some other monument be built outside of the city of Washington.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to the gentleman's resolution at all, but I want to know whether, if he receives unanimous consent for its consideration now, he proposes to choke off debate and choke off consideration, or whether he is going to allow an opportunity for debate and for amendment.

Mr. McCALL. I have not any desire to shut off debate. As for the proposition, it is a simple one. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] yesterday insisted upon complicating a resolution to make the one-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln a holiday with an independent and different proposition, and the result is that we can not have Friday as a legal holiday. This resolution simply proposes to have a commission consider the question of some suitable design and location in the city of Washington for a memorial to Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman receives unanimous consent, will he allow five minutes' debate on this side?

Mr. McCALL. I certainly will.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask whether the adoption of this resolution would not, in effect, practically and substantially cut out the proposition to build a memorial road, or Lincoln Way, from Washington to Gettysburg?

Mr. McCALL. It would not have any such effect. If that memorial road were built, it seems to me it would still be the duty of the United States to erect in the Capital City some suitable memorial to Abraham Lincoln. He has been dead for nearly half a century. His name is as great as any name in the history of the country. We have our squares and circles thronged with memorials to different generals and statesmen, and there is no memorial at this capital to Abraham Lincoln. This resolution presents simply that naked question.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then, may I ask the gentleman why his committee has not permitted to come before the House for its consideration the amendment put on by the Senate to another resolution providing for a survey of that memorial road to Gettysburg?

Mr. McCALL. This committee has had no control over it. There is now upon the calendar of the Committee of the Whole House a report from this committee, but there is no way of getting at that report except by unanimous consent. I have twice tried to call it up by unanimous consent, and it has been insisted that a certain appropriation should be made for the survey of the highway as a condition precedent to having a holiday on Friday—an entirely different proposition from that. I would say that this highway proposition can be considered separately upon its own merits.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of a splendid memorial to Abraham Lincoln. I think the whole proposition ought to be considered together, and therefore, for the present, because I think the adoption of this resolution would cut out all further consideration of the Lincoln Way between here and Gettysburg, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

IMMIGRATION STATION AT BOSTON, MASS.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 13851) providing for a site and the erection of a new immigration station thereon at the city of Boston, Mass., and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the conference report and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (H. R. 13851) entitled "An act providing for the purchase of a site and the erection of a new immigration station thereon at the ctiy of Boston, Mass.," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, striking out all the said amendment of the House to the Senate amendment, and inserting:

"Provided, That this act shall not be construed to amend, modify, or repeal joint resolution numbered seventeen authorizing the use and improvement of Castle Island, in Boston Harbor, approved May 1, 1890."

Also, on page 1, line 5, strike out the words "a site now owned by or to be ceded" and insert the words "any site except Castle Island now owned or controlled by the Government of the United States or upon any site to be ceded."

And the House agree to the same.

BENJ. F. HOWELL,
BURTON L. FRENCH,
JOHN L. BURNETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

WILLIAM P. DILLINGHAM,
H. C. LODGE,
A. J. McLAURIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The only matter in difference between the two Houses was whether or not Castle Island should be removed from the provisions of the bill. The Senate recedes from its disagreement from the amendment of the House to the Senate amendment and agrees to the bill with an amendment which removes Castle Island from the provisions of the bill, and an amendment which recites that the bill shall not be regarded as disturbing a resolution touching upon the ownership, use, or control of Castle Island.

BENJ. F. HOWELL,
BURTON L. FRENCH,
JOHN L. BURNETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—REPORT OF COMMISSION ON COUNTRY LIFE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President, which was read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

[For message see proceedings of Senate of yesterday.]

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

The SPEAKER. Under the law governing the counting of the electoral vote the Senate will be seated on the right of the Speaker. It has been customary for Members to vacate from the center aisle to the wall the first four rows of seats for the Senate. Gentlemen will be kind enough to vacate those seats and accommodate themselves elsewhere.

At 1 o'clock the Doorkeeper announced the Vice-President and the Senate of the United States.

The Senate entered the Hall, preceded by their Sergeant-at-Arms and headed by the Vice-President and the Secretary of the Senate, the Members and officers of the House rising to receive them.

The Vice-President took his seat as presiding officer of the joint convention of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying the chair on his left.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE. The two Houses of Congress have assembled pursuant to the requirements of the Constitution and the laws of the United States for the purpose of counting the votes of the electors of the several States for President and Vice-President. Agreeably to the well-established practice, the reading of the formal portion of the certificate will be omitted unless there is demand to the contrary. Having ascertained that the certificates are in due form and properly authenticated, the tellers will count and make a list of the electoral votes of the several States in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the State of Alabama.

Senators BURROWS and BAILEY, the tellers appointed on the part of the Senate, and Representatives GAINES of West Virginia and RUCKER of Missouri, the tellers on the part of the House, took their places at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BURROWS (one of the tellers). Mr. President, from the duly formed certificate of the electoral vote of the State of Alabama it appears that William J. Bryan received 11 votes for the office of President [applause] and John W. Kern 11 votes for the office of Vice-President.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE. The Chair is obliged to suggest that all manifestations of applause or approval are in contravention of the proprieties of the occasion. They disturb the dignity and decorum which should characterize the great transaction now proceeding in the presence of the American people. The Chair is confident that a repetition of this admonition will be unnecessary.

The tellers then proceeded to announce the electoral votes of the several States in their alphabetical order.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE. The certificates of all the States have now been opened and read. The tellers will now make a final ascertainment of the result and report the same to the President of the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY (one of the tellers). Mr. President, the certificate from the State of Wisconsin recites that its electoral vote was cast for "William H. Taft, of New York, for President," and for "JAMES S. SHERMAN, of New York, for Vice-President." Under the Constitution, it is not permissible for electors to vote for a candidate for President and Vice-President both from the same State with themselves; and we are not, therefore, at liberty to treat this as surplusage, because it is proper, and I might almost say essential, to designate the State of the candidate voted for, so as to show that the candidates for President and Vice-President are not both of the same State as the electors. Your tellers perfectly understand, however, that this is a clerical error and, with the permission of the body controlling it, they would be glad, with this explanation, to report the vote of the State of Wisconsin as having been cast for William H. Taft, of Ohio, for whom all the other electoral votes were cast, and the tellers ask the President of the Senate to submit that question.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE. Unless there is objection to so doing, the vote of Wisconsin will be recorded for William H. Taft, of Ohio. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BURROWS (one of the tellers). Mr. President, the tellers report the result of the ascertainment and the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, for the term beginning March 4, 1909, as follows:

Number of electoral votes to which each State is entitled.	States.	For President.		For Vice-President.

This announcement of the state of the vote by the President of the Senate shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President of the United States, each for the term beginning March 4, 1909, and shall be entered, together with a list of the votes, on the Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Gentlemen, the great business for which the two Houses of Congress were assembled having been completed, the joint meeting is dissolved. The Senate will now return to its Chamber.

The Senate retired from the Hall, and (at 1 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the Speaker resumed the chair and called the House to order.

RECESS.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey moves that the House stand in recess for five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.), the House took a recess for five minutes.

The recess having expired,

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

AMENDMENT TO NAVIGATION LAWS.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 27970) to amend section 8 of the act approved May 28, 1908, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to navigation, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 27970) to amend section 8 of the act approved May 28, 1908, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to navigation, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8 of the act approved May 28, 1908, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to navigation, and for other purposes," be amended by inserting in line 8, page 427, of the Statutes at Large, first session Sixtieth Congress, after the word "sides," the words "or ends," and on line 21, after the word "dollars," the following:

"Provided, however, That the foregoing requirement in regard to life line or rope shall not apply to any scow or boat the deck outside the coaming or rail of which shall not exceed 1 foot in width."

Also the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the requirements in regard to life line or rope contained in section 8 of the act approved May 28, 1908 (being chapter 212 of the Statutes at Large, first session Sixtieth Congress), entitled 'An act to amend the laws relating to navigation, and for other purposes,' shall not apply to any scow or boat the deck outside the coaming or rail of which shall not exceed 1 foot in width. On any such scow or boat its name or number and owner's name painted in letters and numbers, at least 14 inches long on both ends of such scow or boat, shall be a compliance with the provisions of the said section in regard to name, number, and owner's name."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CALDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid upon the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 18417. An act for the relief of Clark County, Ky.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege and present the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 553.

Whereas it appears from the RECORD of February 9, 1909, that House resolutions Nos. 548 and 551 purport to have been introduced by a number of Members of the House; and

Whereas it is a question of serious doubt whether such practice is in conformity with and is authorized under the parliamentary procedure governing the control and the conduct of the business of this House; and

Whereas it is desirable to determine whether bills or resolutions may be presented to the House in the name of more than one Member:

Resolved, That the Speaker be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint a select committee of five Members of the House to investigate and report as to the right of Members to present bills or resolutions as provided by the rules with the name of more than one Member of the House attached thereto.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, in presenting this resolution I have no desire whatever to interfere with the two resolutions mentioned in this resolution. There has been recently a practice initiated to present bills with the names of two Members or more appended thereto. The resolutions mentioned illustrate the development of the innovation. One of them purports to be introduced by 8 Members, the other by 29 Members. There are serious objections to this practice. In the first place, the introduction of bills or resolutions originally was a question of leave, and only by a gradual evolution have Members been permitted to present, as under our present rules, private bills to the Clerk and public bills to the Speaker. In effect, the presentation of bills and resolutions is a motion to introduce or to be permitted to introduce such bills in the House. If bills of a scandalous character are introduced, under the practice of the House they may be stricken from the files. If bills are introduced with the name of a Member attached thereto without his authority, they may be stricken from the files. If a number of names be attached to a bill and the inference allowed or the statement made that a particular bill is introduced by more than one Member, it may be a very difficult matter at some time to fix the responsibility for scandalous matter or to determine whether a particular Member authorized the use of his name.

At any rate, the practice, which in my opinion is unwarranted, has been growing to such an extent that it seems to me that in the interest of proper procedure in this House it is desirable, after a careful examination, to determine whether more than one Member can attach his name to a bill. As illustrating the results of this procedure a question might arise in this way: Suppose a resolution of inquiry were introduced in the name of more than one Member. If not reported within a certain time it would be a privileged motion to discharge the committee from the consideration of the resolution. It might be a difficult matter for the Speaker to determine which of the two or three or a dozen Members whose names were attached to the resolution would be entitled to recognition to make the privileged motion. Under all the circumstances, it seems most desirable that the proper practice be determined at this time, so that the House may conduct its business in conformity with the rules of procedure that from time immemorial have regulated such matters.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield to the gentleman for that purpose. If he wishes to make any comment, I shall yield him time. Otherwise, I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the previous question upon the resolution.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

Mr. WALDO. I ask that the resolution be read.

A MEMBER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. KEIFER. Division!

The House proceeded to divide,

Mr. WALDO. Mr. Speaker, I again request that the resolution be read. I am unable to ascertain what the gentleman is trying to do, and I want to know before I vote.

The SPEAKER. The House is dividing. Objection was made to reporting the resolution again.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 120, noes 6.

So the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the appointment of the following Members as the committee provided for under the resolution: Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. OLMSTED, Mr. CURRIER, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. SHERLEY.

SALE OF TIMBER ON ALLOTTED INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 4548.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4548) to provide for the sale of timber on allotted Indian land, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That any adult Indian of any reservation to whom an allotment has been or hereafter shall be made and a trust or other patent containing restrictions on alienation issued, or hereafter shall be issued therefor, is, with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior and under such regulations as he may prescribe, hereby authorized to sell the timber on his allotment.

Timber on the allotments of minors may likewise be sold by the father, mother, or Indian agent, or other officer in charge, in the order named, and the Secretary of the Interior shall make such regulations for the disposition of the proceeds of said sales as may be necessary to protect the interest of said Indians, including such minors.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman what is the reason for giving this permission, not only to sell the timber on lands allotted of Indians, but of minors?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, Mr. Speaker, the reason is simply this: At the present time there is no law by which the timber on allotted Indian lands may be sold, no matter what the necessity or what advantage it may be to the Indians. For instance, there is a particular case in my State in the Colville Indian Reservation, where we granted by a special act to a smelting company the right to build a smelter there. There is no land in the neighborhood excepting that belonging to the Indians; and while we authorized this company to use such timber as it needed, there was no way by which the people who went in there and settled up the country could obtain lumber. The company could not buy the timber from the Indians and sell lumber to the people; there is no lumber there, and so far the people simply have to live in tents. There is no railroad and they can get no lumber. That is one illustration. The adult Indians can not sell. If the land is allotted to a minor, he can not work it, nor can he sell the timber to anyone.

And it does seem it would be well, in the interests of the Indians as well as the community, that, under proper regulations, down timber or ripe timber could be sold; and in case even the timber were only fit for cord wood, that could be sold instead of being wasted, and the Indians' interests protected by restrictions that would be imposed by the Interior Department. The Secretary of the Interior controls all that, just as he does in the case of the lands themselves, and it seems to me that it would be very greatly to the interest of the Indians, and also to the various communities of the country, if something of this kind could be enacted into law. It might be well for the Indian to clear 5 or 10 acres of his allotment for cultivation, and yet, as it is now, the timber can not be sold, the land can not be cleared, and the Indian is encouraged to live in idleness.

Mr. MANN. Well, of course, no doubt there ought to be some method by which mature timber and down timber and dead timber could be disposed of; but does the gentleman go so far as to say that we ought to authorize the cutting of all timber on all Indian allotted lands, including minors' lands, practically without restriction, at this time, when we are endeavoring to conserve our timber resources?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, I think the Secretary of the Interior, with his officials, and the Department of Agriculture, through the Forestry Division, can be depended upon to see that it is not wasted. The committee considered the proposition of putting in the words "mature and down timber," but it was thought best not to limit it at all.

Mr. MANN. I do not see what the Forestry Service has got to do with it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That was struck out in the Senate, but I referred to it as it had been in, and I have no doubt but that the Interior Department would ask the cooperation of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. MANN. I have not that confidence in the Interior Department in regard to timber that the gentleman has, though I have great confidence in the department.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, in answer to that, I will say that they are looking after the Indians' welfare very closely, and I do not expect that they will sell that timber, except on a limited number of allotments and in a fair and reasonable way.

Mr. MANN. I saw last summer I do not know how many million feet of logs lying on the ground in the Menominee Reservation, in Wisconsin, half of which was destroyed, spoiled, and of no value, and most of the balance probably will be, because the Interior Department had permitted it to be cut.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That was the reservation that we passed a special act for, I presume.

Mr. MANN. Before the sawmills had been taken onto the ground perhaps most of the timber was valueless. They will not cut enough timber with that sawmill out of this immense quantity of saw logs to pay the expense of cutting and selling the timber.

Mr. JONES of Washington. A situation like that should not be permitted, of course. I do not anticipate that anything of that kind will result from the passage of this bill.

Mr. MANN. That is just the situation that grew up, when they did not even have the authority to cut all the timber on the land. Now, the Interior Department are not timber experts.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They have men in connection with the Indian Department who are pretty familiar with the timber conditions.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman tell us how much timber this would affect?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know. In our section it would affect, I suppose, quite a good deal, because there are some of the reservations that contain considerable timber. It is limited, however, to allotted lands, and most of these are agricultural in character, with possibly a small amount of timber, much of which it would be well to sell.

Mr. MANN. It would affect a great deal of timber elsewhere, probably.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Possibly so, although the great part of the timber on these reservations will be on unallotted lands.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think we ought to know something about what amount of timber is to be affected, and the effect of that timber cutting, before we pass a bill drawn primarily in the interest of some particular section of the country, with reference to which it may be perfectly proper?

Mr. JONES of Washington. So far as the bill is concerned, it is one in which I have no personal interest. It was introduced in the Senate by Senator KNOX, at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior himself, and this particular instance I have referred to was called to my attention, and I began to look the matter up and found this situation.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt there ought to be relief.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It seems to me there ought to be legislation along these lines, because the timber is absolutely going to waste now.

Mr. MANN. But this bill, if it becomes a law, is an invitation to every timber speculator and to every sawmill man to immediately commence work to get hold of the timber belonging to the Indians; and if this bill becomes a law, there will not be enough timber on Indian allotted lands in five years to be worth bothering about.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have great confidence in the Secretary of the Interior and those looking after the Indians. I do not believe there will be any such difficulty as the gentleman thinks; but if he believes that, why, he is justified in objecting to the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Would the gentleman have any objection to specifying what kind of timber should be cut?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think it would be wise to put in any provision of that kind.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman had better let it lie over until we can investigate it a little further and see if we can not prepare a measure that will not turn everything absolutely loose and still will grant the relief which the gentleman seeks.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think this turns the matter loose. I would not be willing to put any restrictions in reference to the character of the timber that should be sold. I would have no objection to allowing the Forestry Service of the Agricultural Department to look after that.

Mr. MANN. I would be perfectly willing if the Forestry Service, devoted to that subject, had control of it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That was in the original bill as introduced, but was stricken out, for what reasons I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Now, I understand, as a matter of fact, if this bill should become a law, the Interior Department, as at present constituted, would ask the Forestry Service for its assistance.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am inclined to think so.

Mr. MANN. That might not be the case to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest to the gentleman, however, that matters relating to the Indians are entirely under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, and there might be a very serious question as to the advisability of having a divided control with reference to these lands.

Now, this timber is a part of the real estate, and, as a matter of fact, the adult Indians could sell their allotments, timber and all, under laws that we have passed and under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. That is not the case all over the country.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is, except where you may have special legislation, because we passed that legislation in the last session of Congress.

Mr. MANN. We have several bills to that effect now on the calendar.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We passed general legislation in the last session applying to allotments all over the country, applying to every reservation, possibly, except those in Oklahoma. Now, if we can trust the Secretary of the Interior to look after the allotments, to allow the sale of them upon such regulations as he may prescribe, it seems to me we can grant him the same authority with reference to the timber on the allotments, and permit him to sell it separate from the fee title to the real estate.

I very seriously doubt the advisability of dividing the responsibility and power between two departments of the Government. It rather seems to me that we ought to depend on the Interior Department, and if that department needs the advice of the Secretary of Agriculture it will get it, but it would be unwise to divide the responsibility. We should have to do that if we brought the Forestry Department into the matter by the terms of the bill. I have no doubt that is why this provision was stricken out of the bill. I think it would be wise to pass this legislation in this way.

Mr. MANN. I can not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course the gentleman has a right to object.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and for the present I object.

TELEPHONE SYSTEM IN HAWAII.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 25139) to amend an act entitled "An act to ratify, approve, and confirm an act duly enacted by the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii to authorize and provide for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a telephone system on the island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii," approved June 20, 1906.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for construction of that portion of the telephone system of the Standard Telephone Company prescribed in the act entitled "An act to ratify, approve, and confirm an act duly enacted by the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii to authorize and provide for the construction, maintenance, and operation of a telephone system on the island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii," be, and is hereby, extended to three years from and after the passage of this act, during which extended period the rights and privileges conferred upon the said Standard Telephone Company in and by said acts shall continue in full force and effect, but subject to the forfeiture therein provided on the failure of said company to otherwise comply with the provisions of time limitations therein prescribed within such extended period.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if there is anything in the act except an extension of time?

Mr. COLE. That is all.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if the company has commenced its work?

Mr. COLE. Yes. Now, a word in connection with the bill. The territorial legislature of Hawaii passed this measure three years ago. It was investigated and confirmed by Congress two years ago. The company that was constructing the telephone business was composed of men from San Francisco. By the earthquake and fire they lost their property, and on that account they could not complete the work within the time prescribed by law. Now they ask for an extension of time for two years.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

EXTENDING TIME FOR FINAL ENTRY OF MINERAL CLAIMS WITHIN SHOSHONE OR WIND RIVER RESERVATION, WYO.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from further consideration, and for the present consideration, of the bill (H. R. 23473) extending the time for final entry of mineral claims within the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation in Wyoming.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of chapter 1452 of the Statutes of the Fifty-eighth Congress (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 33, pt. 1), being "An act to ratify and amend an agreement with the Indians residing on the Shoshone or Wind River Indian Reservation, in the State of Wyoming, and to make appropriations to carry the same into effect," be, and the same is hereby, amended so that all claimants and locators of mineral lands within the ceded portion of said reservation shall have five years from the date of location within which to make entry and payment instead of three years, as now provided by the said act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have the matter explained.

Mr. MONDELL. The mineral locator of public lands at large is not obliged to make final proof and entry of his lands. He may hold them indefinitely and work them, if he desires. The middle entrymen on the Indian reservation are required under the act to make final proof within three years. It is a departure of legislation of this character. The middle entrymen are mostly poor men, and they find it impossible to make a final proof and entry as required by the act; and this proposes to give them an extension of two years, so as to give them the same length of time that a homesteader has within which to make final proof. It is reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. REEDER. Is there any time limit when they can make the original entry?

Mr. MONDELL. Most of the original entries were made about the time the reservation was opened. They can make them at any time.

Mr. REEDER. They can make them at any time, and then this gives them five years from the time they make them?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. REEDER. Why can they not make the proof earlier?

Mr. MONDELL. In a mineral claim the entryman must spend $100 a year on his claim, and $500 in all.

Mr. REEDER. The gentleman says this was reported by the Indian Committee?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. FOSTER of Vermont in the chair.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like unanimous consent to make a brief statement, and then present a request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to make a brief statement. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose on Thursday of last week there was pending a demand for tellers on the question of the adoption of an amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]. The purport of that amendment was to strike out of the appropriation bill any authority that it might contain for the continuation of what is known as the "board of referees of consulting chemists."

Mr. BURLESON. I think the gentleman is mistaken in that, because the gentleman from South Carolina denies that there was any authority whatever for the creation of that board of referees.

Mr. SCOTT. The Chair has ruled that there was such authority, and the purpose of the amendment, as I understood it, was to make it very certain that the law should not be so construed.

Mr. BURLESON. I did not understand the Chair to so rule. The Chair ruled that certain language in the bill was authorized by law. The question is open whether under that language the board of referees is authorized.

Mr. SCOTT. I think the gentleman from South Carolina will not deny that if his amendment prevails it will result in the abolition of the board of referees of consulting chemists.

Mr. BURLESON. Undoubtedly that was his purpose.

Mr. SCOTT. That was the only statement I intended to make. In view of the importance of this proposition, and in view, further, of the fact that a great many gentlemen are present now who were not in the House at that time, I ask unanimous consent that debate be permitted to continue on the amendment for forty minutes, the time to be equally divided between the two sides and to be controlled on the side of the minority by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] and on this side by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that debate may be had on the pending question for forty minutes, to be equally divided between the two sides, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Kansas to use some little time, to give me some idea as to the number of speeches to be made on that side.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, before debate begins I would like to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, strike out all after the word "dollars," in line 71, down to and including the word "dollars," in line 21, and insert, on line 17, page 27, after the semicolon, the following:

"For the examination of specimens of foods and drugs made in the Bureau of Chemistry, under the direction and supervision of such bureau, for the purpose of determination from such examination whether such articles be adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of said act, in the city of Washington, $200,000; out of the city of Washington, $266,460."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB].

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, this is perhaps one of the most embarrassing cases that we have had before the Committee on Agriculture. Those of you who listened to the very temperate and able speech of my colleague from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] will remember that he discussed this question from the viewpoint of there being no law or authority for the appointment of this board. Now, under the rulings of the Chair a few days ago we were led to believe that the very law creating this Department of Agriculture gave authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the provisions of the law touching the pure food and drug act. I am ready to admit, Mr. Chairman, that upon the naked technical question of whether or not this referee board should have been appointed there is considerable doubt, but when we take into consideration the magnitude of the interests involved, the importance to the whole country of carrying out this pure food and drug act, I think, upon a calm consideration of the whole matter, this committee must come to the conclusion that the Secretary of Agriculture acted judiciously and within the provisions of the law construed liberally. This very section here quoted by my friend will, in my judgment, give ample authority. Mr. Chairman, I have not the time to read section 3 of this act, for I suppose gentlemen here are as well posted as I am, but if they will turn to section 3 of the food and drug act they will see, I think, that there is provision even in that act for the appointment of these experts.

Brought down to its last analysis, the question presented for us to decide to-day is just this, whether we are going to leave all of this administration work in the hands of one man, whether we are going to turn the Department of Agriculture over to the rulings of one of the chiefs of a bureau in that department, or leave it in the hands where it belongs, the Secretary of Agriculture. If there be no law for the creation of this referee board, then I ask you under what law and by what authority are there to-day serving perhaps 75 or 100 appointees under this inspection law, recommended by the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry and confirmed by the Secretary of Agriculture? If you adopt this amendment and turn this department over to the rulings of the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, what becomes not only of this referee board but of these other appointees? In other words, if there be no law and no authority for the action of the referee board, what authority is there for the other board, composed of the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, Mr. Dunlap, a scientist, and Mr. McCabe? If the Secretary of Agriculture can not control his own department, then we had as well abolish the office of Secretary of Agriculture. There is more at stake here than one would think who had not studied the question carefully. It is a question reaching down to every article of food consumed in this country, and while I have the highest regard for the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, it is well known not only to the members of the Agricultural Committee, but to Members of this House, that he has made rulings on the pure-food question that affect the manufacture of articles all over the country and comes home to every farmer. I will give an illustration. Let us take the question of saltpeter. If the rulings of the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry are carried out, we in Virginia and other States will not be allowed to put saltpeter on the hams that we send in interstate commerce, and I say to you now, as I have said before, that if saltpeter would kill people there would be scarcely a man living in eastern Virginia to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] has referred to the magnitude of the interests involved in my amendment. What are the interests involved? To what interest does the gentleman from Virginia refer. To the lives and health of 90,000,000 of the consumers of this country, or the few hundred packers who have persistently and flagrantly since the enactment of the pure-food law of 1906 evaded and violated its provisions? The interests are enormous, but as far as I am concerned, I prefer to stand by the interests of the great consuming public, rather than to place myself on the side of the illegitimate and dishonest packers who have violated and are now violating the law, and endeavoring by every device to hamper the thorough enforcement of its provisions against food frauds and poisons. I want to say in the outset, Mr. Chairman, that my amendment is not prompted by any partisan feeling or political motive, and——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question just for information. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it takes it from the board and simply places all power in the hand of this chemist. Am I right?

Mr. LEVER. My proposition is to see to it that the law is enforced by the official upon whom the law places the enforcement—the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry—as is set out in section 4 of the pure food and drugs act.

Mr. GRONNA. And is that decision final?

Mr. LEVER. That decision is final as far as facts are concerned. The facts are referred to the Secretary of Agriculture under the law; and in his discretion he passes the facts up to the proper federal district attorney, as the law provides, and the district attorney brings suit in the name of the Government against the offending packer, as is directed by this same section 4 of the act, which is our work and will.

Mr. GRONNA. Does the gentleman believe it would be well upon such an important question as this to make it possible for anyone to take it to the court?

Mr. LEVER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I did not catch that.

Mr. GRONNA. Does the gentleman believe it would be well upon a proposition of this kind, of such importance, to compel a man to take the decision of this one man, for, as I understand the gentleman, his decision would be final and no appeal could be taken from that decision?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will my colleague allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. LEVER. One moment—the gentleman from South Carolina finds no discretion in this matter. The law itself points out what appeal an aggrieved manufacturer may have and to what court he can take an appeal. The language of the law is unmistakable on this point. Congress provided the machinery in the law and we ought to see to it that the law is obeyed or else amended.

Mr. GRONNA. I understand that is what you are trying to change by your amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Not at all. Let me say to my friend that the President, acting through the Secretary of Agriculture, some months ago appointed a referee board of consulting chemists, with jurisdiction over and above that now exercised by the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry under his statutory authority. The law gives the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry a specific duty to perform, a duty imposed by us, but the referee board is appointed in the meantime, without authority of law, and in the exercise of its powers supersedes the authority of the Bureau of Chemistry and takes into its own hands the enforcement of the law. That is the point to this.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. I yield for a question.

Mr. HAYES. I would like to ask the gentleman, with his permission, if it is not true that this will not destroy this referee board completely, but simply prevents them from receiving pay for their services.

Mr. LEVER. I may say to the gentleman from California frankly that if my amendment prevails here, or if it does not prevail, I intend to follow it up by offering another amendment to take care of the question which the gentleman has raised.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is the order of the President creating or appointing this referee board at the command of the gentleman?

Mr. LEVER. I think I might find it here somewhere.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I thought it might be well to have it read.

Mr. LEVER. It was read in my speech of the 3d instant, and it is in the RECORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I was saying when interrupted—and it is well-nigh impossible to make a logical statement with all these interruptions—that I hope this matter will not take on a partisan aspect. I have been in this House many years, and I have my first political speech to make.

I have been sent here, as I understand it, to represent the business interests—the farmers, merchants, professional men, and all—of the district which I have the honor to represent, and I feel that I can be of more service to my people by looking after their business, material interests, than I can in taking up time in discussing academic political questions which others are better prepared and more inclined to discuss. Mr. Chairman, I want it distinctly understood that this amendment is not intended as a criticism of the Secretary of Agriculture. No man in this House, no man in the country, has a higher regard for Secretary James Wilson than I have. In my contact with him, socially and officially, I have found him courteous, frank, and always ready to give ear to any statement that may have in it an idea or suggestion calculated to be of use to the agricultural interests of any section of the country. In the administration of his great office he knows neither political nor sectional lines, and we in the South have come to look upon him as our special friend, as somewhat one of us. [Loud applause.]

His work in my State has been of extreme benefit to us, and our farmers feel they have no more earnest friend that he. He has been among us, and has a most comprehensive understanding of our agricultural problems and a most sincere sympathy with us in solving them.

He has done as much for the State that I in part represent and for the entire South in the last twelve years as any man living to-day, and I have for him not only a profound admiration, but almost a feeling that amounts to veneration, and I would be the last to criticise him or wound his feelings. [Applause.] But the matter of the diversion of $100,000 from the purposes for which it was appropriated came to the attention of the committee. It struck me as bad administration, bad business, and it occurred to me that if the President of the United States, acting through the Secretary of Agriculture, had deliberately diverted an appropriation from the purposes for which it was appropriated and had applied it to the payment of the expenses of a referee board created in violation of law, then it was time for somebody to protest on the floor of this House. If the time has come when executive impulses are to take the place of well-deliberated legislative action, then this House, in the interest of economy, ought to adjourn sine die, go home, and stay there. [Applause.] And to bring this situation to the attention of the House is my only motive, save the greater one of my interest in the strict enforcement of the law against fraudulent and dangerous foods.

Mr. COLE. How much of this appropriation has been expended for the purpose?

Mr. LEVER. I understand about $27,000 have already been expended in the examination of one of the subjects referred to and that there are two more to be examined.

Mr. COLE. Will a part of this remaining $100,000 be available for this purpose unless the appropriation provided for in this bill is carried?

Mr. LEVER. It is available, and it is being used.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to request the gentleman to inform the committee what appeal there is now from the chemist when he renders a decision?

Mr. LEVER. An appeal to a federal court, as laid down by the act; and let me read to the gentleman from Nebraska the act, so that the committee may know just what the law says about it:

SEC. 4. That the examinations of specimens of foods and drugs shall be made in the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, or under the direction and supervision of such bureau, for the purpose of determining from such examinations whether such articles are adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act; and if it shall appear from any such examination that any of such specimens is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause notice thereof to be given to the party from whom such sample was obtained. Any party so notified shall be given an opportunity to be heard, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed as aforesaid, and if it appears that any of the provisions of this act have been violated by such party, then the Secretary of Agriculture shall at once certify the facts to the proper United States district attorney, with a copy of the results of the analysis or the examination of such article duly authenticated by the analyst or officer making such examination, under the oath of such officer. After judgment of the court notice shall be given by publication in such manner as may be prescribed by the rules and regulations aforesaid.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of each district attorney to whom the Secretary of Agriculture shall report any violation of this act, or to whom any health or food or drug officer or agent of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia shall present satisfactory evidence of any such violation, to cause appropriate proceedings to be commenced and prosecuted in the proper courts of the United States, without delay, for the enforcement of the penalties as in such case herein provided.

Does that answer the gentleman?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is to say, then, that the decision of the chemist does not of itself shut the manufacturer out of the market, but the process of the court must be appealed to before he can be prevented?

Mr. LEVER. That is entirely correct; and that, Mr. Chairman, is the proposition we are standing for—a proposition of permitting the law to stand as it now stands; of allowing the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry to perform, unhampered and unhindered, the duties imposed on him by the law. If there is an aggrieved manufacturer, if somebody feels that he has been badly treated, he has his recourse under the act, and that recourse is in the federal court when his case reaches it. That is all. For sixteen or eighteen years the great consuming public of this country demanded pure-food legislation——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. I will.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman says that if any manufacturer feels aggrieved at the decision of the chemist, he has his remedy by going to the federal court. Is it not the law that the Government must go to the federal court?

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The procedure, as I understand it, must be begun by the Government against the manufacturer.

Mr. LEVER. That is very true; but the manufacturer has his remedy in the court. He meets the prosecution arranged by the Government; he brings his expert chemists to testify, and the Government brings its chemists to testify; and the evidence is taken and the case is heard like any other case in any other court and decision made from the facts presented. No one can be injured by such a course, and the public is saved the great risk in eating preserved foods.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The point I had in mind was that the burden is not on the manufacturer. The burden is on the Government.

Mr. LEVER. The burden is on the Government to prove its case. The manufacturer has been protected by the law. He has been leniently treated. In fact, I fear he has been hugged to the bosom of the Government, and we want to hug him a little bit more by creating a sort of a filtration plant of referee boards and commissions, through which justice must slowly filter while the great consuming public suffers. My amendment proposes to give consideration to the public, protect the people against the greed of food adulterators and misbranders.

Responding to the demand of the people during sixteen years for pure-food legislation, Congress in 1906 enacted a pure-food law; and in the enactment of that law I want to call the attention of the committee to this fact. It is a most important fact as showing the intention of Congress in the matter of this referee board. The House sent its bill to the Senate with a provision in it carrying a commission with authority exactly like this now carried by the referee board. The Senate debated that proposition, and pointedly and deliberately struck it from the House bill. The bill as amended went to conference, and the conferees agreed that this provision should be stricken from it. It became a law and was signed by the present Chief Executive without this provision.

Yet, in face of the fact that Congress enacted this legislation, pointedly, specifically, deliberately cutting out a referee-board idea, and after the law has been in operation for only two years, this same President, at the behest of the manufacturers—perhaps legitimate, very likely illegitimate—directed the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint a referee board. The expressed and positive will of Congress is of no avail against his hasty impulse to listen to siren song of the insidious packer. How was this law enforced? The Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, Doctor Wiley, enforced it in the spirit in which it was enacted. What was that spirit? The spirit of protecting the health and life of the consumer against preservatives, drugs, poisons, and misbranding. He enforced the law liberally; it was his duty to enforce it liberally. It is presumed Congress intended and the country expected a liberal enforcement in the protection of the public against poisonous preservatives and fraudulent foodstuffs.

Some have criticised the chief of the bureau for being enthusiastic. Enthusiastic in what, gentlemen? Enthusiastic in the interests of the great consumers of this country, enthusiastic for a strict enforcement of the spirit of the pure-food act. If such enthusiasm be a crime, would that more of the public officials of this country were tainted with that crime. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not the gentleman think that the manufacturers of the country ought to be protected from technical decisions in matters that affect their business?

Mr. LEVER. Of course.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would like to state to the committee that the flour millers of the country understand Doctor Wiley has made a decision restricting them from electric bleaching, because he says that it introduces a nitreous element in the flour, and he has prohibited the use of the process. Now, the facts are that the process only causes about one-millionth part of nitreous condition to form in the flour, and that means a man would have to eat 10,000 loaves of bread to be injured.

Mr. LEVER. Now, let me tell you the facts about it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now, why should not the flour manufacturers be protected against such a ruling as that?

Mr. LEVER. Now, what are the facts as to that? I am perfectly familiar with the ruling. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to the fact that not more than three or four weeks ago the supreme court of North Dakota passed upon this very flour case, and held that the bleaching of flour was in violation of the law of the State of North Dakota, on the ground that bleaching covered up inferior material.

What is the purpose of bleaching? It is to take inferior wheat, bleach it, and make the flour look as if it were ground from first-class wheat. [Applause.] Not only that, but it will be remembered some years ago we introduced the growing of durum wheat into this country. Durum wheat does not make as white flour as does hard wheat. Durum wheat, to be used, has to go through this bleaching process to get white flour, so that it can go on the market in competition with the hard wheat of the country. This durum wheat, mind you, sells in the market, I am told, for 20 cents per bushel less than the hard and fine grades of wheat, and it is of importance to the durum dealers that they should be able to bleach this flour, and thereby sell it under a deception and fraud as having been made from the best grade of wheat.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not the gentleman admit that the process allows the farmer to find a better market for his wheat?

Mr. LEVER. I do not admit it. The durum wheat grower comes in competition with the grower of first-class wheat, and sells his cheap wheat for just as good a price as does the grower of the first-class wheat, and to that extent limits the market for first-class wheat.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I am glad the gentleman has brought this matter up. I say that it is a fraud upon the farmers to permit this bleaching process. Under the pure-food law they should not be permitted to use this process. As the gentleman has well explained, the durum wheat is sold at from 10 to 20 cents a bushel less, and the flour is not the same as that which is made from hard wheat.

Mr. LEVER. This is another case where your preservatives and artificial processes permit gross frauds upon the consuming public, and positive injury to the legitimate industry. The pure-food act is intended to remedy this abuse which had grown to alarming proportions before the enactment of the law, and which will again become a scandalous abuse under the present system of hampering and retarding the enforcement of the act in all its strength and spirit of protection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. LEVER. I have not used twenty minutes, have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used twenty minutes.

Mr. LEVER. I should like to have opportunity to conclude my remarks.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina be allowed five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina may have five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I think we will have to object, unless this side can have five minutes more.

Mr. GRONNA. Then I will ask unanimous consent that five minutes more be given to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. LAMB. Will my friend agree that the gentleman from South Carolina may have five minutes if he can also have five minutes?

Mr. SCOTT. If we can have five minutes on this side, I will not object. I will ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended ten minutes, the gentleman from South Carolina to have five minutes and this side to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Now, I do not know, because I am not a chemist, whether benzoate of soda is a dangerous preservative or not. I know that the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry says it is a dangerous substance. I know that the great food experts of the world are almost unanimous in the opinion that it is a dangerous preservative. I know that the great chemists of the world and the medical profession say that it is harmful. I know that the great preponderance of the evidence is against its use, and that is sufficient reason for my objecting to its use.

I know that the state food and dairy commission in their convention have protested strongly against its use; that the convention of canners held at Louisville, Ky., only a few days ago, 3,000 strong, unanimously adopted resolutions against its use and commendatory of Doctor Wiley's great work. I know that my mail for the past week has been literally flooded with letters, resolutions, newspaper articles, and petitions sustaining my position and urging me in the interest of the consuming millions to continue the fight for the integrity of the pure food and drugs act and its enforcement in the spirit of its enactment.

I say I do not know that benzoate of soda is a dangerous preservative. I believe that it is; but whether it is or not, I do not wish to take the chance of permitting it in the foods of this country in the face of the opinions of so many great experts who firmly believe in its deleteriousness. This is the situation: Your child is lying sick. A half dozen physicians are called in. Five of them say that the use of a certain drug can do the child no good, but at the same time can do it no harm. The one says that to administer this drug may bring fatal results. These men are of equal ability and standing in their profession. Life and death hang upon the decision. Shall the drug which can do no good but may do harm in the opinions of the five be administered, when the one positively declares that its use may be fatal? Prudence and common sense would forbid the use of the drug. And this is the exact situation with respect to the use of preservatives in foods. No one claims them to have any food value. The very fact that they are used to preserve foods from decomposing shows conclusively that they can not aid digestion, for digestion is a process of decomposing food and not preserving it.

If benzoate of soda as a preservative may be harmful and is pronounced by those who should know best to be harmful, if it has no food value, if it is not necessary in the manufacture of foods from wholesome first-class materials, if it works no good and may work so much harm, what justification is there for its use? Why does a certain class of manufacturers insist upon its use? There is but one answer—they desire to palm off upon an unsuspecting public cheap and inferior goods.

They desire to fatten their purses at the risk of the lives and health of their customers. It is cheaper to use cores, peelings, and refuse; cheaper to employ insanitary methods in manufacture; cheaper to employ cheap labor, than it is to use first-class raw material, first-class sanitary methods, and first-class, well-paid labor. It is the old fight of dividends over again. No one denies that these preservatives can be, and in many cases are, used to cover up the methods I have mentioned to put upon the market food frauds, and it is against these practices, against these methods, that the strong arm of the law was raised, and when it was about to be brought down upon the heads of conscienceless manufacturers by the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, these concerns rushed to cover behind this new creation—the referee board.

My amendment proposes to leave the enforcement of the law where the law put it, and my whole desire is to maintain the integrity of this act, which is a part of our law, because the consuming public demanded protection against the intolerable methods of food manufacturers. If the law needs amendment, let it be amended in the proper way; but I protest against these insidious plans to nullify its provisions and to lay down the gap for the return of the methods in vogue before its passage. [Loud applause.]

Under the leave given me to print certain statements, letters, and other documents, I insert the following.

This is an advertisement of one of the largest and most reputable manufacturers in the country:

A PUBLIC STATEMENT.

THE PEOPLE'S HEALTH OR THE FOOD MANUFACTURER'S PROFIT.

Experts always disagree on scientific questions, and so they naturally differ about the danger of benzoate of soda in prepared foods. Some of them say it is a harmless substance in small quantities, while many other leading authorities of both Europe and America pronounce it a dangerous drug. Thus a doubt exists about the safety of its use.

Benzoate of soda is not used to improve any good article of food. There is no difference of opinion on that point.

Why, then, do any manufacturers contend for the privilege of using benzoate of soda? Simply because it permits a cheapening of the cost of product through a reduction of food value, employment of loose methods, and too often of unfit raw material.

All that is necessary to say to any thinking person is that reputable manufacturers who use only fresh fruit and vegetables and who employ only sanitary methods in their preparation (and there are many) do not find it necessary to use any chemical preservative.

COLUMBIA CONSERVE COMPANY,
Indianapolis, Ind., February 6, 1909.

A. F. LEVER, M. C., Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your telegram of January 30, addressed to the Columbia Conserve Company, was received during my absence. I regret very much the unavoidable delay in answering it.

We are distinctly opposed to the use of benzoate of soda in foods. I have never claimed that I knew anything about the physiological effect of benzoate on the consumer, and I do not feel that I know anything more about it now than I have for several years. Scientists seem to be very evenly divided with reference to this matter.

My position is that it is not necessary in those products which we pack, namely, condiments; and that therefore as there is doubt as to its healthfulness I can see no reason why the public should not be given the benefit of the doubt.

My principal objection to its use is that it permits, and in fact, fosters unsanitary conditions in the packing of food products, and also admits and fosters the use of unsanitary food materials.

With reference to the matter of tomato catsup, there is several times as much catsup made from refuse material in this country to-day as there is catsup made from whole, ripe tomatoes. I doubt very much that the use of this refuse material can be prohibited if artificial preservative is not prohibited, unless the national and state governments put into effect an adequate system of factory inspection. This same result could be secured, in my judgment, by the very much cheaper system of prohibiting chemicals.

Yours, very truly,
WM P. HAPGOOD.

REFERENCES AND QUOTATIONS RE ARTIFICIAL PRESERVATIVES.

The society strongly disapproves of the practice of adding preservative chemicals to milk and other foods. (Resolution of British Society of Medical Officers of Health.)

An opinion inimical to the use of preservatives * * * on the ground that these substances were added to food for the purpose of destroying or preventing the devolpment therein of living organisms, and hence that these same substances when introduced into the highly organized animal could not behave indifferently to living matter, but must also tend to exert upon it some influence. (Conclusion 93.)

Both of above from the "Report of the departmental committee appointed to inquire into the use of preservatives and coloring matters in foods." (London, 1901.)

I believe that, in general, preservatives and antiseptics in food are unfavorable to digestion and injurious to health, and they invite the use of certain grades of foods which would otherwise not obtain. (Prof. A. B. Prescott, of Ann Arbor, Mich. Evidence before Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, House of Representatives, 1902.)

On general principles, one would object to the use of antiseptics. The substance that would destroy the life of micro-organisms could not be expected to be beneficial to the life of a higher organism. It would be largely a matter of dose. I mean to say that the same dose that would kill a bacterium would not necessarily kill a man, but still it would be hostile to the protoplasmic actions that constitute the life of even a high animal like man. (Dr. W. D. Halliburton, F. R. S., professor of physiology, King's College, London. Testimony before the departmental committee, London, 1901.)

S. A. Vasey, F. C. S., F. I. S., member S. P. A.:

"In the case of benzoic acid, the presence of that acid—certainly in the case of invalid foods, and, possibly, ordinary foods—might be objectionable on the score of increasing the acidity of the urine and possibly setting up irritation in the urinary tract. It gives, as you know, hippuric acid." (P. 69.)

Dr. William Williams, representing the Incorporated Society of Medical Officers of Health:

"* * * and in the present state of our knowledge regarding these substances (preservatives), it would probably be better to prohibit their use altogether, for there can be no doubt that the principle is utterly bad, and the practice of drugging the public promiscuously and without their knowledge, and by incompetent persons, when they are in good health is very dangerous." (P. 71.)

Maj. C. E. Cassal, public health officer of Great Britain:

"The admixture of certain chemicals with articles of food for the purpose of keeping them in a salable state, and also for the purpose of enabling sale of inferior and even actually bad articles, to be palmed off on the public as good and fresh, is a practice which has become very widespread. It is alleged by the apologists for this practice and by those who are obviously interested in its unrestricted continuance that the 'public demand' for many articles of food can only be met by the use of preservative chemicals. Apart from the question of 'cheapness,' this argument is disposed of from the fact that the articles in question are largely and successfully sold without the admixture of any preservative chemicals at all. If a preservative chemical is present in a food in sufficient amount to exert its specific effect on that food, that fact is in itself sufficient to show that the digestion of the food by the consumer must be injuriously affected, and such admixtures must therefore be regarded as injurious to health.

* * * * * * *

"In my opinion, the use of preservative chemicals is unnecessary, as far as public advantage is concerned, while no doubt their use may be advantageous to certain manufacturers and venders for pecuniary reasons." (P. 130.)

Harold Faber, commissioner of Danish Government:

"I think there may be two objections in principle to the use of preservatives. In the first place, they are chemicals, and the people using them, not being generally chemists, are unable to judge of the quality of the article they use; they are also generally ignorant of the effects of them. It therefore seems less safe to leave it to them to decide whether to use them and in what quantities and so on. That is my objection in the first instance. Secondly, the idea of adding preservatives to foods is to prevent them from decomposing, but in the course of digestion these same articles of food are intended to be decomposed, and I therefore think, as far as the preservatives prevent these foods from decomposing by their use, they are also liable to prevent the proper digestion of them." (P. 145.)

Dr. A. Grunbaum, lecturer on chemical physiology, University College, Liverpool:

"I should like to say that it seems to me that, on general grounds, preservatives should be forbidden." (P. 222.)

Interview in Washington (D. C.) Post, January 27, 1909:

Dr. H. S. Blackmore, consulting chemist to State of New York:

"Benzoate of soda, of which we have heard so much of late as being employed as a food preservative, has all of the ear marks of a most dangerous substance.

* * * * * * *

"Commercial benzoic acid is manufactured from horse or other animal urine or artifically made from coal tar. All these facts would point to the possibility of benzoic acid, or its compounds, not only being of a composition most dangerous to health, if continuously used, but, to say the least, an unclean substance as a constituent of an article of food."

Minutes incorporated, Sanitary Association of Scotland, Congress at Perth, September 8, 1904:

"I would urge that in the present state of our knowledge it is not right or safe in the interests of public health that any unskilled person should be permitted to dose the public with preservatives, even with less harmful preservatives." (James Hendrick.)

When we consider that the excretion of most of these substances (preservative) falls chiefly upon the kidneys and recognize the fact that kidney disease is a main cause of the loss of one kind or another of vitality in middle life, and, indeed, figures very largely in mortality records, we can not but feel that the legalization of potent germicide is a matter of the most serious kind."—Doctor Magill, address before British Medical Association, Toronto, August, 1906.

These decisions (Food Inspection Decision, 101–102, United States Agricultural Department), as every practicing physician must know, are fraught with great danger to the public health. There is considerable difference between the foods of any poison or irritant given in a few experiments in the laboratory and those of the same poison taken continuously after long periods, even in small quantities. I have not the slightest doubt that sodium benzoate, and especially the commercial or synthectic benzoate, taken in foods more or less continuously will derange digestion and set up irritation and degenerate changes in the gastro-enteric mucus. (Dr. S. Solis Cohen, Philadelphia; General Medical American Association, January, 1909.)

International Congress of Medicine, Madrid, April, 1903:

"Long-continued use of food containing antiseptics may cause grave digestive disturbances, the real cause perhaps not being recognized by physicians. The substance administered in small daily doses for a long time may show its toxic effects very different from those caused by the single administration of a medical dose of the substance. The statement on the label of the presence of the antiseptic is not sufficient for the protection of the consumer, as in most cases the latter is ignorant of the danger of the chemical preservative." (Dr. P. Bronardel, delegate of Legal Society of Medicine of France.)

Presidential address, North Wales Branch British Medical Association:

"In actual practice the ingredients are daily used in unknown quantities, and often under distressing and lowering circumstances. It is also proved that fully 80 per cent of preservatives used in food are excreted unchanged by the kidneys. This statement has been confirmed by Doctor Hannington, who states that in his investigations he found 'the kidneys inflammatory.' The action becomes insidious, and although there may be but few instances of acute poisoning, it is interesting to note the comparative prevalence of diseases of the alimentary system in 1904 as compared with twenty years ago, when the use of these preservatives was not carried on to such an enormous extent as it is in these days." (Dr. Richard Jones.)

You may take it when antiseptics are added it is because the proper means are not adopted to insure sterilization; to prevent, in other words, the ill results from bad working or the use of poor or dirty material. As a rule you will only find antiseptics added by second-rate firms and to the cheapest articles.

There is no doubt that the unrestricted use of these should be condemned, for although in the case of those more commonly employed the recorded instances in which the practice has caused harm to the consumer are few, the ignorant employment of large quantities may effect slight and indirect injury to health, and are capable of seriously interfering with digestion. Salicylic acid is depressing, benzoic acid is irritating, sulphurous acid is a gastric irritant, and formaldehyde has a strong tendency to combine with proteids and to harden them and reduce their digestibility.

Moreover, the use of chemical antiseptics is not necessary, and they facilitate an uncleanly, slovenly treatment of food, and render it possible to preserve articles in incipient decomposition for some time with every appearance of freshness. (Journal of the Sanitary Institute, vol. 26, 1905–6, pp. 276–277, H. R. Kenwood, professor of public health, University College, London.)

It is not permissible to agree to the proposition that the maximum amount of any single preservative shall be determined. As in the case of strong poisons, views of experts as to toxic doses in single or repeated use are widely divergent, and it is much more difficult to determine with scientific accuracy the active qualities of preservatives which may be used for years. Even if it were possible to determine the quantity of every preservative which would not injure health when consumed with the food in a single day, further difficulty would arise when this daily dose of the material under consideration would have to be distributed among the foods to be preserved thereby, and which would be consumed in the various meals. (Deutscher Reichs-Anzeiger, Berlin, Feb., 1902.)

International Congress for Hygiene, Berlin, 1907:

"The application of chemical methods of preserving food increases dangers to health in many ways:

"(a) The added preservative may be directly injurious to the human body. In this connection the dangers to children, invalids, and old people should be considered. The general use of chemical preservatives may cause a considerable amount thereof to be ingested in one's daily food, even though each single article of food contains very little.

"(b) The preservative may decrease the nutritive value of the food.

"(c) The addition of a preservative may permit a careless and dirty method of manufacture.

"(d) The addition of a preservative stops the growth of bacteria that has already begun in the food and thereby keeps it in an apparently unchanged, fresh state, when in this food poisons quite sufficient to make it dangerous to health have already been formed. If the preservative had not been added, the food would have continued to decay, when its condition would have been a warning against the use of it.

"(e) The added preservative may only apparently stop decay of the food, when the latter may become poisonous. In these cases the preservative has not removed the danger from decayed or stale food, but it has removed the warning of the danger, viz, the changed appearance of food that is not sound or fresh.

"This effect is specially dangerous when the preservative has no perceptible taste or smell by which the purchaser or the consumer may know he has to deal with a food containing a chemical preservative.

"For the protection of the health of the people, it is not sufficient to prohibit such preservatives as have been already proved to be harmful, because the injurious effects of many substances are manifested very slowly and may not be noticed for a long time. The principle should be that no added preservative shall be permitted that has not been proved harmless by long-continued experiments on animals and on human beings." (Dr. M. Gruber, Prof. K. B. Lehmann, Dr. Th. Paul.)

"Concur in the opinion of Messrs. Gruber, Lehmann, and Paul that all chemical preservatives should be prohibited by law except those that have been used for centuries and have been found to be harmless." (Dr. Abel, Berlin.)

If benzoate of soda is used in food for human beings it may cause grave injury to health, especially when consumed by invalids and delicate people.

Benzoate of soda should be included in the list of preservatives injurious to health. (Dr. Doepner, University of Königsberg.)

I have long held the opinion that the practice of adding antiseptics to articles of food which are daily and habitually consumed by individuals of all ages is not a desirable practice. (Sir Henry Thompson.)

Because no tangible evidence is forthcoming of injury to health arising from the employment of antiseptics in small quantities for the preservation of articles of food, I do not consider that our knowledge can be regarded as sufficiently extended and complete upon the point to permit its being absolutely taken for granted that no injury is producible. By the use of antiseptics it is the vender and not the consumer that is benefited. (Dr. Pavy.)

The onus of proof rests with those who use preservative substances in foodstuffs. We know that the question of idosyncrasy enters largely as to whether the substances used—salicylic acid, boric acid, and the like—are dangerous. And what may be comparatively harmless in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred may be exceedingly harmful in the hundredth case. Also, what may be considered harmless when given in a single dose, or for a short period, may have very serious effects if continued over a lengthened period and the physiological effect of multiple doses, especially if the substances have an accumulative action, may be exceedingly harmful. (Dr. G. Sims Woodhead.)

On general a priori grounds it can hardly be doubted that the continued use of even small quantities of antiseptics is injurious. (Dr. W. D. Halliburton, The Lancet (London) 1897.)

(Meeting American Public Health Association, Boston, 1905.)

Formol, or formaldehyde, acid benzoic, salicylic, sulphites, bisulphites and hyposulphites, boric acid, boratium of soda, and silicate of soda, as also fluoruros and fluoborates, are products dangerous to health, and which are recommended against the opinions of hygienists who, with reason, proscribe all these additions.

The foods conserved with these products are less assimilable and their digestion slower and incomplete. Some of these foods certainly increase mortality.

Studies of great importance have been made with other products, such as sulphite of soda and all the remaining compounds which owe their properties to sulphurous acid.

The fatty degeneration of the parenchyma of the kidneys is due to the continued use of this product, as shown by Doctor Kionka, who has since 1896 experimented with these substances on a grand scale on dogs. (Prof. Jose D. Morales, Mexico.)

COMPARATIVE EXAMINATION OF THE PHARMACOLOGICAL ACTION OF ORGANIC COMBINED SULPHUROUS ACID AND NEUTRAL SODIUM SULPHITE.

[By Reg.-Rat. Dr. E. Rost and Dr. med. Fr. Franz.]

1. The principal result of the preceding experiment is, first, the determination that sulphurous acid in no way loses its poisonous properties, for all conditions, by its combination with aldehyde, sugar, and acetone. The addition products are neither inactive, as has been claimed by some, nor have they a peculiar action independent of the properties of their single constituents, but they act according to their wont, not other than sodium sulphite or sulphurous acid.

2. A further result is therefore: The dissolution of the organic bonds of the combined sulphurous acid is the necessary precedent for the appearance of the action. The speed with which this dissolution proceeds determines the quantity and concentration of the active constituent broken off, the same for all the compounds examined, and therefore the degree of the poisonous action and the speed of its appearance.

3. The third result of the preceding investigation is therefore: The poisonous series determined under the experimental conditions maintained proceeds parallel with the series in which the four compounds concerned appear according to their dissociation which proceeds gradually in aqueous solution, measured with iodin solution (at ordinary temperature) by the part of the combined sulphurous acid which could be titrated.

In the single experimental series in which all experimental conditions were maintained the same, so that the results of the series concerned were comparable, the four combined sulphurous acids examined differed always in the same way one from the other. In all experimental series the glucose compound showed sulphite action strongest; it dissociates fastest in aqueous solution; in all experimental series the acetaldehyde compound was less poisonous; it dissociates to a less degree in aqueous solution. Only the formaldehyde compound, being still less dissociable, showed itself less poisonous in our experiments. (Arbeiten aus dem Kaiserlichen Gesundheitsamte, 1904, vol. 21. Work from the Imperial Health Department (Germany), 1904, vol. 21.)

NORTH DAKOTA AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE,
February 1, 1909.

Hon. A. F. LEVER, M. C., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of January 30, I am in receipt of your telegram reading as follows:

"Does your association oppose the use of all chemical preservatives in foods? Are you officially and personally opposed to the use of all chemical preservatives in foods? Will the legalization of an unrestricted use of benzoate of soda result in harm to infants and invalids? Would you favor letting all questions go to courts instead of being officially decided by the referee board of consulting chemists? Wire answer and write full particulars at once."

The Association of State and National Dairy and Food Departments at their annual conference at Mackinac August 4 to 7, 1908, unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this association is convinced that all chemical preservatives are harmful in foods, and that all kinds of food products are and may be prepared and distributed without them, and pledges its best efforts to use all moral and legal means at its disposal to exclude chemical preservatives from food products, and to this end we ask the cordial support of all national, state, and municipal authorities charged with the enforcement of food and drug laws. And in this connection we desire to express our gratitude for the helpful services of the medical profession generally, and especially to the American Medical Association."

Thus placing themselves on record as squarely opposed to the use of chemical preservatives of any kind in the preparation of food products, and this came as the result of the experience of food men of the country, both food commissioners and chemists, after many years of study and observation.

Personally and officially I am opposed to the use of all chemical preservatives, and the legalization of an unrestricted use of benzoate of soda will, in my judgment, result in harm to infants and invalids and introduces into the system a product which is not a food but a drug and medicine, a product which is recognized by the physician to modify some vital action of the body without itself furnishing any nutriment to the body.

I am opposed to the use of benzoate of soda for the further reason, without regard to its effect upon health, that where benzoate of soda is used we often find vegetable products which have become decayed and are unfit for human food and could not and would not be utilized if benzoate of soda were not employed as a preservative agent.

At the present time our examinations show, for example in catsup, that when catsup is made from ripe tomatoes without the use of preservatives the product keeps and there are very few mycelium present, indicating little or no decay. In the majority of cases where benzoate of soda is used, an abundance of mycelium may be found by the use of the microscope, showing clearly the refuse character of the material employed, and that decayed material is largely admixed. The same thing is true with regard to other food products.

Personally, it seems to me that the only place for testing the law or for deciding the questions involved under the law is in the courts, and that the official in charge of the food law should be allowed the greatest degree of latitude. Where there is a difference of opinion between the food official and the manufacturers the courts should decide each individual case and establish the precedents to be followed.

Yours, very truly,

E. F. LADD.

LETTER FROM A CALIFORNIA WINE PRODUCER STATING WHAT THE PERMISSION OF BENZOATE OF SODA WOULD MEAN TO THE CALIFORNIA WINE PRODUCER.

[From letter of Percy T. Morgan, dated February 1, 1909.]

You can, I think, well understand how much "up in the air" we are at this decision of the "referee board" on benzoates. For ten years we have been fighting the use of preservatives in wine. Now, it would seem that all the labor we have expended, all the trouble we have gone to, all our immense investments in permanent structures for storing and maturing wines, and in fact everything that made the wine business attractive to settled capital and tended to withdraw it from the realms of pure gambling from season to season has, all at one sweep of the pen, been nullified. If deleterious fermentations can be arrested and held by the use of antiseptics, then skill and care in wine making will become old-fashioned and obsolete. The careful nursing of wines, the elimination of distillation of those developing poorly will be commercially unnecessary, because in the initial stages all defects will be able to be covered up by sophistication.

As I have said before, we do not know where we stand; we do not know what course to take, because it is perfectly patent to anybody who knows anything of the wine business that the greatest items of expense in connection with it are interest, taxes, insurance, and evaporation upon the maturing product. If it is not necessary in order to make wine marketable, to mature it so that clarification is a natural process; if all imperfections can be concealed and the wines rendered clear and marketable through the addition of extraneous agents, then all a wine merchant needs for the ordinary line of trade, namely, the supplying of the daily wine consumer (who looks to the price of his beverage as one of its most important things), is a shed, a few tanks, and a good supply of bill heads.

I print here parts of an editorial from the February number of the National Food Magazine:

The people of the United States believe chemical preservatives to be harmful—the farmer and the urbanite are of one opinion on this subject.

While chemists have detected their harmful qualities from laboratory experiments, the people have learned of them through sad experience.

It is probable that there is not a man, woman, or child in the United States, not interested in a food factory, who would not vote against the use of chemical preservatives in foods.

With the preponderance of evidence to the effect that chemicals in foods are harmful and poisonous, it would at least seem that there is room for doubt as to their legality and wholesomeness. As long as there is such a doubt, why should not the people be given the benefit of it instead of the manufacturers of chemical foods? Are the people not as worthy?

Even, however, if we should disregard this mighty array of evidence that chemicals are harmful, there is still another reason why they are illegal and should not be used. This consists in the facts that they are not foods, they contain absolutely no food value, and the only possible excuse for their use is to lessen the cost of production, conceal inferiority, and encourage slovenliness and insanitation in food factories.

THE PEOPLE MUST KNOW THE CAUSE.

But there are manufacturers of legitimate foods who have souls and consciences, and who would rather go out of business than to be responsible for such widespread disaster as they firmly believe results from the chemical treatment of food products. They say that chemicals are unnecessary for the preserving of foods when pure raw products are employed and when absolute cleanliness is observed in the manufacture. It would seem that our national authorities ought to side with this class of manufacturers and with the people instead of with the class of manufacturers which caused the pollutions of America's food supply before the enactment of the national food law.

PURE-FOOD MANUFACTURERS ORGANIZE.

The attempt to nullify the provisions of the national food law has aroused new and powerful forces into action. The highest class of manufacturers, who originally favored the enactment of a national food law, and who have been satisfied to abide by its provisions, both in letter and in spirit—regardless of the numerous exceptions and rulings that have been made in favor of the manufacturers of low-grade materials—are now up in arms to secure their own protection from the vilest kind of competition to which they have been subjected.

These manufacturers of strictly pure, high-grade foods have organized themselves into a mighty force. The organization will represent a combined capital of millions of dollars. It will expose the graft there is in the manufacture of food frauds. It will open the eyes of the people to where they are being robbed and swindled by the meanest kind of deception. It will bring into view conditions existing in many food factories worse than Upton Sinclair ever pictured in Packing Town.

This organization of pure-food manufacturers proposes to make itself felt with the administration at Washington and with the food department in every State.

Also parts of an editorial from The Outlook of January 30, 1909, a paper with which President Roosevelt is to become identified after the 4th of March:

PURE FOOD AND DECENT FOOD.

One of the best results of the operation of the pure-food law has been to make it possible for people to learn for themselves what prepared food products are mixed with chemicals and what not, and to decide, apart from any question of possible poisoning, which kind they prefer to eat.

There are certain chemical substances concerning which, among scientists, some doubt may exist as to their injurious effects; yet if even these are used, the label on the bottle or package must state the fact. Now, it is urged, with much force and truth, that even where chemicals used for preservative reasons are not in themselves poisonous, yet their use allows the manufacturer to put up inferior fruit, or meat, or what not, and even to put up refuse material—in some cases it is alleged that the material rejected and thrown on the floor when putting up the superior brands is swept up and included in goods of the cheaper brand. If it is true that the use of chemical preservatives allows such abominations to go undetected, then the consumer may well, for his own sake, refuse to buy tinned or bottled food products when the label shows, in however small print, that a chemical preservative has been used. But this raises another question, namely: Is it possible to put food products on the market without the use of chemical preservatives? Here we find another exceedingly encouraging result of the pure-food law. Several of the larger and better-known manufacturers of such products, actuated evidently both by genuine interest in the consumer's welfare and by a sound commercial instinct, have declared that in most if not in all cases the use of preservatives is quite unnecessary. Every housewife knows that fruit, for instance, if carefully selected, with the rejection of all tainted parts, carefully handled, not diluted with water, and protected accurately and positively from the air, will "keep" perfectly well with only the addition of sugar and, if desired, of spices. What can be done by the ordinary housewife can be done with far more certainty if performed on a large scale with the increased accuracy of measurement, mixing, and handling which naturally and necessarily accompanies wholesale manufacture. It is true that some large manufacturers declare that unless chemicals are used there is danger of ptomaine poisoning, and that their rivals who will not use chemicals bring about the same result to some extent by the excessive use of condiments, and that these in turn may serve to conceal the early stages of taint. The best authorities in this country, however, and we may add the practical experience in every household, confirm the reasoning of those who believe that "pure food" means "nothing but food"—that is, no chemicals. Furthermore, the consumer must be very careful not to assume that a chemical is not in fact injurious. Take, for instance, benzoate of soda. The chemist of the Department of Agriculture has never declared that this substance is altogether harmless, and, as we understand it, entertains a contrary belief. Yet, since there is a fair difference of opinion among scientists on this point, and as regards certain other chemical substances used in the preparation of food, their use in limited quantities and with the fact stated on the label has been permitted temporarily.

The resolutions of the canners referred to in the body of my remarks are as follows:

[Louisville Courier-Journal, February 5, 1909.]

THREE THOUSAND CANNERS ADOPT RESOLUTIONS.

The committee on resolutions, composed of Hugh Orem, of Baltimore, chairman; S. F. Hazerot, of New York; William R. Roach, of Hart, Mich.; L. A. Sears, of Chillicothe, Ohio; and George G. Bailey, of Rome, N. Y., offered several resolutions regarding important legislation that were unanimously adopted. These resolutions follow:

"Prior to the enactment of the food and drugs act by the Congress of the United States, in 1906, the National Canners' Association, in convention at Atlantic City, N. J., placed itself upon record and published its findings to the consumers of the United States, declaring its unequivocal, unalterable, and inflexible opposition to the use of chemical preservatives in whatever form or by or under whatever name.

"To this positive, definite, and advanced action and the influence of the National Canners' Association, which was brought to bear upon the representatives in Congress, the adoption of the pure-food law was largely due.

"Since the adoption of the federal law various state laws have been enacted regulating the canning and selling of hermetically sealed fruits and vegetables. In the main these laws accomplish the same purpose of the federal law, but not infrequently they differ in some minor provision, subjecting the canner to a useless and unnecessary expense in his desire to comply therewith. Uniformity of state laws with the national law is most desired and earnestly recommended. It is therefore

"Resolved, That the National Canners' Association in convention reaffirm every action in the past wherein it has protested against the use of chemical preservatives in the manufacture of canned food as entirely useless and unnecessary, sterilization by heat being the only preservative known or of any use to the canner.

NOT INTERESTED IN CHEMICALS.

"Resolved, That the membership is not interested in the merits of chemical preservatives of any kind, nor, indeed, has it any knowledge either as to their beneficial or harmful effects. Our interest is confined exclusively and entirely in acquainting the public that such preservatives have not been nor are they now used by the canner in the preparation of his food output.

"Resolved, That the thanks of this association are due and are thus conveyed to Dr. Harvey W. Wiley for the many favors given this association, and for his hearty cooperation with us in upholding the letter and the spirit of the law. His services have been invaluable to the consuming public and he is justly entitled to the gratitude he is receiving from the American people.

"Resolved, That the legislative committee of this association shall be instructed to adopt ways and means whereby the various state pure-food laws may be amended to conform more closely to the act of Congress known as the 'Food and drugs act.'"

NAVY SNUB FOR DOCTOR WILEY—DEPARTMENT ORDERS CATSUP PRESERVED WITH SODA BENZOATE.

NEW YORK, February 6, 1909.

That the Navy Department and Doctor Wiley are at odds on the poisonous character of benzoate of soda is shown in the latest proposal from the Navy Department. On October 3, 1908, the Navy Department called for proposals for 600 gallons of tomato catsup. The specifications describing the catsup say that it is to be made of whole ripe tomatoes and must be guaranteed to keep at least three months.

It is right here the proposal and Doctor Wiley come into conflict. Doctor Wiley, after extensive study last June, came to the conclusion that benzoate of soda as a preservative was deleterious. President Roosevelt's board took up the matter and disagreed with the doctor. Now, to clinch the matter, the navy proposal specifies outright that the benzoate of soda is to be the only preservative used.

Doctor Wellman, who it is presumed has something to do with the specifications for the catsup, has not been heard from so far, but it is expected that the controversy may lead to an investigation of the Navy Department's method.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF SUPPLIES AND ACCOUNTS,
Washington, D. C., February 9, 1909.

SIR: Referring to your visit to the bureau to-day, the attached article in the Washington Post, headed "Navy snub for Doctor Wiley," in representing that the Navy Department has disagreed with Doctor Wiley as to the use of benzoate of soda is incorrect and without foundation. On the other hand, this bureau has been only too pleased to follow the wishes of the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry in regard to any provision in the specifications for any article which it purchases for the naval service. The facts are that when the question of preparing the specifications for catsup was under consideration the bureau consulted with Doctor Wiley's office as to the use of benzoate of soda; and inasmuch as it had not been then determined as to whether this article should be prohibited commercially under the pure food and drugs act, it was decided to incorporate into the specifications a provision requiring each bidder to state the percentage of benzoate of soda which was used by him. In accord with this arrangement those firms who offered their products in which this article was used stipulated the percentage, and other manufacturers who did not use it omitted filling in the amount used.

The bureau did not require the use of any preservative. Some firms submitted bids on catsup put up with not more than one-tenth of 1 per cent of benzoate of soda, and others used no preservative at all. This arrangement was made, as stated above, solely because it was not specifically prohibited in commercial use, and the bureau was awaiting the decision of the Bureau of Chemistry as to whether or not it should be used.

Since the passage of the pure food and drugs act the bureau has been working in entire harmony with Doctor Wiley's office in regard to any changes or amendments in specifications, and all of its contracts for provisions contain the following clause:

"It shall be expressly understood that all of the provisions to be furnished under this contract are guaranteed by the contractor to conform to the provisions of the national food and drugs act, approved June 30, 1906, as well as conforming to any state law in which deliveries are made, in so far as they apply; compliance therewith will be proved by tests made at the navy-yard, or under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, and shall conform to the standards prescribed in Circular No. 19, office of the Secretary of Agriculture, dated June 26, 1906, or to such other standards as may be subsequently adopted by that department."

The bureau considers itself very fortunate in obtaining the expert assistance of the inspectors of the Bureau of Animal Industry, Bureau of Chemistry, and other bureaus of the Department of Agriculture. Its inspectors now inspect all meats and meat-food products, groceries, butter, etc., which are purchased for the enlisted men of the naval service and which forms part of the ration allowed each man by law. This assistance has been rendered with hearty cooperation, and has resulted in improving very materially the quality of the food furnished the enlisted men. No changes in specifications for any article are adopted until after the approval of the proper bureau of the Department of Agriculture, and this bureau is in constant consultation with that department in regard to questions which arise in conducting official business.

The bureau is pleased to take this opportunity to express its highest appreciation of the valuable assistance which it has received from the officials of the Department of Agriculture, particularly those of Doctor Wiley's office, and it is always only too glad to follow their wishes in any question which may arise.

Respectfully,
E. B. ROGERS,
Paymaster-General, U. S. Navy.

The Hon. A. F. LEVER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from South Carolina may be extended for five minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. I shall have to object to that.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman, the question before the House is a very important one and yet not a very difficult one to understand. The thing that we are all trying to do is to discover the truth. The pure-food law passed a few years ago made it unlawful to place upon the market foods that had been adulterated or treated in a manner which rendered them injurious to health.

I shall speak particularly with reference to the treatment of dried fruit, as that is the one that interests my constituents, and it is a question with which I am most familiar. It is the practice in California, where fruits are dried in the sun, to give them a smudge of sulphur. Doctor Wiley, the eminent chemist which we admit him to be, does not say that all applications of sulphur fumes are injurious, but he admits that they may be used up to a certain point. We differ from him as to the amount of sulphur that may be safely used. It is the judgment of the fruit growers of California that if we were limited to the very small amount that he suggests, it would practically drive us out of the dried-fruit business, unless we could discover a new treatment.

The question was considered of sufficient importance for the President to refer the matter to five of the most eminent chemists in the land. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], urging his point, does not object to a rehearing of the matter; he does not urge that the opinion of Doctor Wiley shall be conclusive. But he says, "go to the courts."

Mr. LEVER. Where the law says you must go.

Mr. SMITH of California. We say, "go to the most eminent aggregation of men on this subject that you can possibly have in the Nation."

Suppose we take up the course suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] and take the matter into court. What results? We stand before a lawyer and ask him to determine a purely scientific and hygienic question. Of course no upright judge would undertake to solve the question by the knowledge he had obtained from the law books. He would be obliged to take testimony, and expert testimony, of course, and hence we should, by a circuitous route, get back to the point where we now stand, except that it is doubtful if any court in the land could command the testimony of such eminent and disinterested witnesses as the President has called in in the present instance. The question involving the sulphuring of fruit would probably be tried in the West, where sulphur is used, where the defendants reside. If the use of the benzoate of soda is to be tested, that would go to the courts in the jurisdiction where that preservative is chiefly used, and so on through the list of disputed points. Is it probable that any of these courts will sit in entirely disinterested surroundings? And could and would a judge in California call in the best men from the East, South, or Middle West?

Let it not be forgotten that the fruit and vegetable growers will suffer seriously by having this case dragging through the courts, with the attendant notoriety, not to mention the injury done by the preliminary order resting on Doctor Wiley's finding.

Why should these roundabout and injurious methods be chosen when there is now in session a "court" of ideal composition quietly seeking for the truth? This body has been at work for a year past, and to cut it down now would be to cast aside all it has accomplished. From every point of view I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PERKINS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 23464) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DAWSON].

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment submitted by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] is a most remarkable proposition. Its purpose and effect is to make the chief of a division in the Department of Agriculture paramount to the head of the department himself.

It seems to me there can be no escape from the proposition that the responsibility for the administration of the pure-food law must rest with the Secretary of Agriculture as the head of that department. The Secretary of Agriculture ought not to be simply a scientist or a chemist—he should be an eminently practical man, such as the present Secretary, Hon. James Wilson, who has filled that position for the past twelve years with such great distinction to himself and such vast and far-reaching benefits to his country, and whose service in that department I trust may continue for many years to come.

Now, we are confronted with the question—with responsibility for the enforcement of the pure-food law placed upon the Secretary, are we to deny him the right to call in such expert assistants as he may require for the proper determination of scientific questions arising under that law? Secretary Wilson gives it as his personal opinion that it is necessary for him to have the assistance of eminent and distinguished experts. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, there can be no reasonable doubt that this House ought not to set up a chief of division—even so eminent and able a man as Doctor Wiley—not only above the Secretary of Agriculture, but above the President of the United States. Surely it is not wise to make the chief of a division the final arbiter in such important matters, especially when final responsibility rests with the Secretary.

Mr. LANDIS. Is it not true that the Bureau of Chemistry is now composed of expert chemists?

Mr. DAWSON. To be sure; but the expert scientific gentlemen everywhere are always in controversy as to what the real truth is.

Mr. LANDIS. How much nearer the truth are you if you refer it to this board of chemists composed of the heads of colleges?

Mr. DAWSON. The Secretary of Agriculture, upon whom rests the responsibility in the last analysis for the enforcement of the pure-food law, ought to have the power to call in such experts as he may wish in regard to determining technical and scientific questions and to assist him in reaching an intelligent judgment in these matters. That is the nub of the whole question.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I believe I am as firm a friend to the pure food and drug legislation as any man in this House. I think that when we have heard to-day the statement in reference to pure food, and that this means that we are not to continue investigations in reference to poison put in food, I think it is a mistake. The idea is this: If conditions continue to go on as they are now, Doctor Wiley, for whom I have as high a regard as any man in the House, will be supreme in his decisions. His decision will be final; and when he makes a decision there will be no appeal, except if in his judgment we violate the law we will be permitted to go into the court, permit ourselves to be arrested, and demonstrate whether Doctor Wiley is right or wrong.

Now, if this referee board is appointed, it simply means this: That you have that much more evidence, if they agree with Doctor Wiley, that he is right. It is sometimes the case that men are mistaken in these things; sometimes as good men as Doctor Wiley are mistaken in their opinions in reference to what is deleterious to health, and, in my judgment, I believe this board ought to be kept in force so the Secretary of Agriculture may have these questions referred for final decision, that are matters of dispute in the medical profession and among scientists.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. STANLEY. In the event that the Supreme Court of the United States should render a decision which was manifestly erroneous and oppressive to the great majority of people and to the President of the United States, and the President should appoint a commission to review that decision of the Supreme Court, would the gentleman approve that act or regard it as legal?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that is an analogous case to the one we are discussing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I want to say just one word in addition, if the committee will bear with me, that so far as benzoate of soda is concerned, if used in small quantities it may likely not be deleterious to health, yet I think the greatest caution should be exercised in the use of any preservative. Nothing, in my judgment, should be done to impair the effects of the pure food and drug law. I believe a referee board, where those who are dissatisfied may go for appeal, will have a tendency to strengthen the act.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL].

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, we are all working to the same end, that the pure-food law may be enforced and that only healthful and wholesome food may be allowed to go into trade. Chemistry is an occult science about which the ordinary man knows but little, and it is quite true that great chemists may differ as to their analyses of various things. This is an important question not only to the consumer but also to the producer, and the best ability obtainable in the decision about which there is grave dispute should be secured. And no man should arrogate to himself all the ability or knowledge of this important matter. The good judge of an inferior court is always glad to be reviewed by a court of appeals. He has no pride, and he is willing to have his judgments reviewed and to follow the decision of the higher court in his next decision. This board of referees is a court of appeals in this matter of the analysis of foods. I do not know any of them except the chairman, Dr. Ira Remsen. Thirty-odd years ago, when I was in Williams College, Doctor Remsen was the professor of chemistry and physics in that institution. He was a young man then and he was an able chemist and a great physicist. He was accurate in all his analyses. He was an honest man and he was fearless. He has been growing ever since and he is now the president of Johns Hopkins University. He is the foremost chemist in the United States to-day. Notwithstanding my respect for Doctor Wiley, for his ability, his character, his honesty, I do not think he ought to refuse to be reviewed or to have any of his examinations on important matters reviewed by so great a man as Doctor Remsen, and I do not think that we ought to deprive ourselves or the people of the country of the protection assured to them by the scientific knowledge of that great chemist and honest man who is now the president of Johns Hopkins University. This proposed amendment should fail.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, personally I object to the statement that has been made or intimated to the effect that all of those who would oppose this amendment are not friendly to the enforcement of the pure-food law. I also dissent from the statement that the manufacturers of this country are opposed to that law. I myself was a member of the committee which framed the pure-food act and which sat and took the testimony of gentlemen who were interested, and I saw only one disposition, and that was to have a law that would protect the public against impure food and drugs and at the same time afford protection to the manufacturing interests of this country which would try to obey that law. What do gentlemen propose? It is to prevent as far as may be the possibility of obtaining the highest, fullest, and best information on foods and food preservatives—to prevent fullest information on doubtful and yet most important questions and leave the decision to one man. And the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] has served notice that he has others if this shall fail. Nobody on this floor has attacked for one moment the finding of the referee board about benzoate of soda.

There is not a man who has questioned the honesty, character, or ability of the gentlemen who constitute that board. I submit that it is not a question of pure food, it is not a question of using deleterious preservatives, but it is a question, in spite of all that gentlemen may say to the contrary, as to whether one man shall decide this question, because the amendment proposes——

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Oh, I do not want to be discourteous, but I would like to finish this statement.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield then?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly, if I have time. Under the law as it exists now, when the Chief Chemist decides that a substance used as a preservative is not fit or that any form of food is not proper to use, and a dealer or manufacturer violates such opinion of the Chief Chemist, suit may be brought. The defendant is brought into court and is tried by the standard which the Chief Chemist has laid down. The defendant has the burden of proving the harmlessness of the thing used and must bring in the men of superior expert ability to make his defense. Why not let a board of such experts pass on these questions of general importance before the man is branded as a criminal and his business injured, if not ruined? I submit, gentlemen, that what the Secretary of Agriculture did in suggesting this board of referees was just what Doctor Wiley, in the printed testimony before our committee, said should be done.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. But Congress refused to do it?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; the House passed a bill including a provision for a board of referees, and it went out in the Senate; but when the question was brought up to Doctor Wiley before our committee he was asked what objection there was to a board of this kind, and he said there was no objection to experts that he could see, but it was not necessary to put it in the law, for the Secretary of Agriculture would take advantage of all these opportunities in finding out what were deleterious and what were harmless.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes, I will; but the gentleman must remember I have only five minutes.

Mr. LEVER. I understand; but I would like very much to ask the gentleman from Michigan what reason there is for the use of these preservatives at all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not know, and for that reason I want a board which does know to tell me about it. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. And for that reason I want to protect the public against the use of them. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes; the gentleman wants one man to sit in judgment, who may have already prejudged the question. Now, I have a great deal of confidence in Doctor Wiley, but if he is the eminent scientist which gentlemen claim for him he will not object to sitting in council with the eminent gentlemen who constituted that board. What we are after is to get at the truth of this matter, and we can get at it no more directly than through the provisions adopted by the Secretary of Agriculture. [Applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire how much time I have remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am anxious that the Members of this House should understand exactly what the issue is which is brought up by the pending amendment, because I am sure that if the House does understand it the amendment will be voted down.

An impression seems to prevail in the minds of some gentlemen that if this amendment is defeated in some way there will be an attack made upon the pure-food law. I wish to give assurance that there is no thought of that kind in the mind of anyone who opposes this amendment. I wish to suggest that the most beneficent law can be broken down by a harsh, uncompromising, unreasonable, and unreasoning construction and enforcement of it.

I wish also emphatically to deny that any of us who oppose this amendment do so through antagonism to Doctor Wiley, the eminent Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry. My own relations with him have long been intimate and cordial, and I have had the highest regard for his professional attainments.

But I take the position that it is the Secretary of Agriculture, and not a subordinate official of his department, upon whom has been imposed by Congress the duty of enforcing the pure-food law. I know the law prescribes that to the Bureau of Chemistry shall be referred the question of determining the character of the ingredients of foods and drugs; but that law also provides that in case any citizen feels himself aggrieved by the determination of the Bureau of Chemistry he shall have a chance "to be heard." Heard by whom? Not by the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, but by the Secretary of Agriculture. And why heard if not that in the Secretary of Agriculture there rests discretion to overturn the decision of the Bureau of Chemistry, if in his judgment the facts so warrant? Why should you give to the man an opportunity to be heard if you deny to his judge the privilege of rendering a verdict in his favor? There can be no question of the intent of Congress when it made the Secretary a court of appeal to whom a man who believed himself to be aggrieved by a decision of the Bureau of Chemistry could come; and there is no doubt that Congress intended to give the Secretary discretion to get information in whatever way he thought best in order to enable him rightly and fairly to determine the matter.

And if the Secretary believes that in order to get the right information it is necessary for him to call in the aid of this distinguished board of chemists, undoubtedly he is within his rights in so doing. Moreover, Congress has distinctly declared him to be within his rights, in my judgment, because in the appropriation act——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield——

Mr. SCOTT. I can not yield now, I desire to finish this statement—because in the appropriation act for the Department of Agriculture, immediately succeeding the passage of the pure-food law, authority was given the Secretary of Agriculture—not the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry—to enforce this law, and to enable him to do so authority was given him "to employ such assistants, clerks, and other persons" as he—the Secretary of Agriculture, not the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry—might consider to be necessary. Under such language it seems to me that Congress plainly foresaw the necessity of the Secretary to employ experts other than those in his own bureau in order to reach a wise decision, and intended to give him the authority to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], and on this question tellers have been ordered. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] will take their places as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 111.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 27, at the end of line 21, insert:

"Provided, That no part of the moneys appropriated herein shall be used for payment of compensation or expenses of any member of any board of referees or other body constituted without specific authority of law for the purpose of revising, modifying, or overruling the action of any official of the Department of Agriculture had under the said act of June 30, 1906."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] makes a point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my point of order and ask for a vote.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire of the Chair whether or not debate was closed by vote of the House on this section?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I did not understand that debate was closed on this paragraph. I do not think, and I do not understand, that debate was closed on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The matter is being investigated and report will be made in a moment.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the RECORD shows as follows:

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on the pending paragraph close at 5 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. On what page is that?

Mr. SCOTT. That is on page 1916 of the RECORD. This morning unanimous consent was given to continue the debate for fifty minutes, but I do not think that it recalls the action of the House taken on last Thursday.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that even though the RECORD shows as the gentleman from Kansas has stated, that would not prevent the offering of amendments and debate upon amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] that amendments are in order, but if the time was all consumed on Thursday last by limitation, no debate is in order.

Mr. LEVER. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the unanimous consent or agreement entered into this morning referred to the amendment that was pending and not to future amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands it. The question depends wholly upon the action that was taken when the bill was under consideration on last Thursday. It is the recollection of the Chair that the time for debate on this paragraph was limited and was consumed last Thursday. Therefore the question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, that being the case, in order that the committee may know what it is voting upon, I ask that the amendment be reported once more.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 79.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 21, page 37, after the word "dollars," insert:
"Of which sum not to exceed $60,000 may be used for the payment of all expenses of the referee board of consulting chemists."

Mr. SCOTT. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order on this amendment, or I make the point of order. It is clearly subject to the point of order. I do not see how it could be otherwise. It is a specific authorization of $60,000 for purposes not now allowed by law. It is not a limitation, it is an authorization.

Mr. LEVER. I understood the Chair to rule that the point of order would not lay against the original language, because there was no law for this very thing.

Mr. MANN. It is not the original language at all. Here is a specific authorization for a board of referees not now created by law. Whether you can pay a board of referees out of the appropriation is one thing. This is a specific authorization for a particular class of employees. It is practically obligatory.

Mr. LEVER. Will the Chair permit me just a word on the point of order? I agree fully with the gentleman from Illinois that this referee board was not authorized by law and is not authorized by law. This amendment is offered largely for the purpose of permitting gentlemen on that side, and a few on this side, to chew their own cud for a little while. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation of soils, and for indicating upon maps and plats, by coloring or otherwise, the results of such investigations, $137,360.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, line 5, change "one" to "two," so as to read "$237,360."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment increases the appropriation for soil-survey work $100,000. The reason I offer this amendment is that I believe the most important work that is being done by the Department of Agriculture is the base work, on which all of its investigations must depend, and that is upon the soil. Unless the farmer, or whoever is interested in agricultural developments, knows what is in the soil, all of your scientific investigations go for naught, because they are absolutely based upon the soil as the foundation stone of the entire investigation. The soil survey to agriculture is like a chart of the seas to navigation. In order that you may sail to the port in safety that you desire to reach you must have a chart of the seas. In order that you may accomplish what you want through scientific agriculture, you must have a knowledge of the soils to begin with before you can expect to accomplish anything.

Now, this Government is spending vast sums of money building a navy, maintaining an army, building public buildings throughout the country. I believe the appropriations for the last session of Congress amounted to something like $800,000,000; and yet for this basic proposition of soil survey, the base of all agriculture, the committee brings in the pitiful appropriation of $137,000.

Now, I know the answer to that is, they say the Secretary of Agriculture does not want any more money and that somebody else does not want any more money. I believe that the Agricultural Department is an excellent adjunct to agriculture. I believe in many ways it is doing great work. But the Department of Agriculture is going to science too much and to the farm too little. What good is all this investigation of scientific problems in agriculture if you do not bring it home to the farmer? To accomplish anything by it toward developing your agricultural resources, the first proposition to bring to the farmer is a knowledge of the soil he is cultivating, and then send a utilization man to him to explain how scientific agriculture can be taken advantage of by the man who tills the soil.

The development of agriculture in this country for the last few years has grown to an untold amount. The reports show that the products of agriculture in the last year amounted to $8,000,000,000, and that that amount has been trebled in the last twelve years; in other words, that our wealth attained through agriculture twelve years ago was only a third of what it is today. It is true the country has grown some, and population has grown some, but that does not account for the development of agriculture. It means that scientific methods, better farming, better utilization of the information that we have, has created all this great development in the field of agriculture; and if you will give them an opportunity to carry this scientific knowledge to the farm and farmer, in the next twelve years we will double the products of agriculture again. But this is the base, this is the foundation rock on which you have got to build, and I say that there is a great demand all over this country from the people, from societies, organizations, farmers' unions, from everybody, demanding that this part of the work be done, that this foundation work be carried out; and yet the committee has brought in this insignificant appropriation and asked this House to vote upon it.

The Bureau of Soils is intrusted with the study of the soil resources of the United States. The first step in such a study is to ascertain accurately, by actual field investigations, the extent, location, and character of each and every distinct soil type in the country and to determine the actual condition and efficiency of each of the different soils as a factor in the annual production of new agricultural wealth. This work is accomplished through the soil survey.

A soil survey determines the exact character of each soil, the kind of crops which it is best suited to produce, and the methods of tillage and fertilization which will lead to the most efficient cultivation of each soil. The survey ascertains by personal observation in the field the present use and capabilities of the different soils and also investigates the results which are being obtained by the most successful practical farmers owning and operating the lands in each district studied. The soil survey summarizes all present knowledge of soils, whether obtained by field investigations or by the chemical, physical, and soil fertility investigations at the bureau's laboratories. It also summarizes the experimental and research work of the various state institutions which are investigating the agricultural resources of the different States and Territories. The soil survey presents an unprejudiced statement of fact concerning each soil and its most profitable uses in each area investigated, and in the vast majority of cases also forecasts and advises additional and more profitable cultivation for each soil.

It presents to the farmer a summarized statement of the best agricultural practice in connection with the soils which he owns and works, and it also summarizes the methods of soil management and soil treatment which are used by successful farmers elsewhere on the same class of soil.

It furnishes to the state institutions engaged in local investigation an opportunity for the application of their experiments and research in connection with individual classes of soils and enables them to advise directly with the farmers in regard to the most successful treatment to increase the crop-producing power of their soils.

The soil surveys also call attention to undeveloped and unused soils and their capabilities, and direct the line of occupation of which these soils are capable, calling attention to new crops which may be introduced and to new methods of cultivation which may be employed.

The importance of the soil survey as a fundamental factor in national development may be judged from the fact that the annual production from the soils of the United States has now reached the enormous figure of $8,000,000,000, having been trebled in the last twelve years. It is the conservative estimate of the experts in the Bureau of Soils that this stupendous amount may easily be doubled within the next fifteen or twenty years through a complete study of the capabilities of soils now cultivated and through the discovery of the proper uses for soils not now occupied as farm lands.

Such an undertaking is of the greatest national importance, not only to secure a firm foundation for the agricultural activities of the nation, but also in order that the necessities of the rapidly growing population of the whole country may be met through the increased efficiency of the farmers and the farms of the United States.

In the conduct of these soil surveys in the various parts of the United States there has at all times been hearty cooperation between the Bureau of Soils and the various state organizations interested in soil study.

In the State of Maine an extension of soil-survey work has been requested by the State College of Agriculture as a basis for recommendations by the state college in connection with the improvement of the general agriculture of the State.

The state college and experiment station in New Hampshire have requested additional soil surveys to assist them in the development of the horticultural interests of the State. In the State of New York a definite agreement has been entered into between the New York State College of Agriculture and the Bureau of Soils, providing that the state college shall furnish both men and funds for the extension of the soil-survey work within the State to serve as a basis for horticultural and agricultural surveys and the agricultural extension work of the New York state college.

In the State of Pennsylvania the dean of the college of agriculture and the director of the experiment station have requested the broad extension of soil-survey work to serve as a basis for both horticultural and agricultural work on the part of the college and station.

In the State of Maryland cooperation exists between the Maryland geological survey and the Bureau of Soils. In the State of West Virginia the field expenses of the soil-survey work are paid by the West Virginia geological survey in order that a larger amount of soil-survey work may be done each year.

The director of the Virginia agricultural experiment station has highly commended the work of the Bureau of Soils already done within that State, and has requested that additional soil-survey work throughout the State be completed as rapidly as possible.

In the State of North Carolina the North Carolina department of agriculture is cooperating actively with the Bureau of Soils, furnishing both men and money, in order to secure additional soil-survey work within the State. The North Carolina state department of agriculture is also following up the soil-survey work with direct demonstrations of the utility of each soil for the production of staple and special crops, and is using the soil surveys as a basis for its experimental work and for the work in connection with farmers' institutes.

The director of the South Carolina experiment station has requested additional soil-survey work in the State as a basis for agricultural extension work on the part of the experiment station in all parts of the State.

The state officials of Georgia have repeatedly in the past requested that soil surveys should be made in every county in which the 11 congressional-district agricultural high schools are located and in contiguous counties as rapidly as possible.

The State of Alabama has appropriated for use by the state department of agriculture the sum of $10,000 annually to be expended in cooperation with the Bureau of Soils in making soil surveys in that State, and the commissioner of agriculture for Alabama says:

> The soil-survey work in the State of Alabama is of the utmost importance to every agricultural interest. The experiments conducted upon the experimental farms in the different congressional districts of the State show that it is easily possible by procuring the right character of cotton for each of the different soil types of the State to increase the profit of cotton production from ten to twenty dollars per acre over that which is attained at the present time. A thorough knowledge of the soils of the State is essential in order to bring about this great increase in the value of the cotton crop of the State.

In Louisiana the officers of the state college and experiment station desire the rapid extension of the soil-survey work in connection with the experimental and demonstration work being carried on by these organizations.

The authorities of the state college of agriculture of the State of Missouri have recently requested that the Bureau of Soils should enter into cooperation with them in making at the earliest possible date a complete soil survey of that State to serve as a basis for further investigations on the part of the college of agriculture. They desire to expend from seven to ten thousand dollars annually of state funds to make this cooperation effective.

The chemist of the state college of agriculture desires the Bureau of Soils also to undertake cooperative work in making soil surveys in the State of Arkansas and has inquired as to the best methods for arranging such cooperation at an early date.

A similar request comes from the authorities of the state college of agriculture of the State of Washington.

A cooperative agreement between the North Dakota agricultural and economic survey and the Bureau of Soils has been in effect for nearly five years, and the State of North Dakota is furnishing both men and funds in order to secure the extension of the work in the State of North Dakota.

Wherever these cooperative agreements have been entered into between the Bureau of Soils and the various state organizations a great impetus has been given to the agricultural progress of the States involved and the state authorities have in all cases requested the Bureau of Soils to allot larger funds for the work within their States as soon as the effects of the soil-survey work and its influence on agricultural uplift have become known.

The soil survey constitutes the first and most fundamental step in the development and maintenance of the agricultural resources of the United States. The work has only been in progress for a period of eight or nine years, and thus far only a beginning has been made in ascertaining the total soil resources of the United States. The work has been so distributed as to give the largest amount of information possible in regard to the different agricultural and soil regions of the country and has proved of inestimable value in the uplift of agricultural conditions throughout the entire country.

There are now on file at the Bureau of Soils the requests for over 500 different soil surveys, covering an area of more than 500,000 square miles. These requests come from every State in the Union and are supported by the petitions of agricultural societies, local and state granges, horticultural societies, and farmers' organizations of every description. In many instances they are also supported by boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and industrial associations of various localities. The funds which have been provided for the prosecution of this soil-survey work during the current fiscal year have not been sufficient to enable the bureau to meet even the new requests which have been placed on file during the year, and at the present rate of appropriation for the conduct of this work the requests on file at the present time could not be met during the next ten years. It is therefore absolutely essential, in order that the wishes of the people of the United States, as expressed to the Department of Agriculture, may be met, that this appropriation should be increased materially.

UNIVERSITY OF MAINE, COLLEGE OF AGRICULTURE,
Orono, Me., September 23, 1908.

Dr. J. A. BONSTEEL,
Bureau of Soils, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR DR. BONSTEEL: I know that the soil-survey work which Mr. Westover has carried on in Aroostook County this summer is most valuable; but, as I have explained in other letters, the conditions are entirely different than in the southern part of the State. The soils of Aroostook County are not varying in character, while in the southern part we have all types, and there is a desire on the part of these people there to use these lands to the best advantage.

I would like to make application through you for a soil survey in southern Maine for next summer, and I trust the Bureau of Soils will see to it that this is allowed.

Assuring you that the university will do all that it can to help in this work, or any other work you desire to carry out, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

W. D. HURD,
Dean and Professor of Agronomy.

CLEMSON AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
Clemson College, S. C., March 20, 1908.

Prof. MILTON WHITNEY,
Chief Bureau of Soils, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR PROFESSOR WHITNEY: I have hoped to make a visit to Washington this winter to talk with you regarding your bureau cooperating with this experiment station in some cotton work that I would like to undertake in this State. There is no doubt but that the different soil types of the State greatly influence the lint of cotton grown, and I would like for your bureau to cooperate with me in determining the exact influence of the different soil types found in the State upon the staple and yield of cotton. Some of the varieties of cotton that have led at Clemson College in yield are poor yielders on other types of soil found in the State, whereas some of the poorest yielders here at the college give the very best results when grown on other soil types. Just why this is and how much the soil's physical make-up has to do with it is a problem worth solving. In other words, if we can determine and know the different soil types found in the State and then determine the best variety for these different soil types we would have solved a problem of great importance to the farmers.

Very truly, yours,

J. N. HARPER, Director.

LINCOLN, NEBR., September 26, 1906.

A day or so ago Mr. J. L. Burgess, of your bureau, brought a soil map of the Nebraska Experiment Station farm to my office, where it was examined by myself and Dean Bessey, of the Industrial College. We were greatly pleased with it. I wish to express my high appreciation of the kind and quality of the work which has been done by your men in making this survey. It was a revelation to us in regard to the work of the bureau and impressed me greatly as to its high value to the farmers of the country. With such a map of the experiment station farm to show the kinds of soil on which its crops are grown, the farmer in any surveyed part of the State may draw safe conclusions in regard to similar crops on his farm. When all the State is mapped by your bureau the value of the work of our experiment station will be greatly enhanced.

Chancellor of the University of Nebraska.

Dr. MILTON WHITNEY,
Bureau of Soils, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to acknowledge your valued favor in regard to the cooperation of your survey with a similar survey of logged-off lands in this State. The association has taken definite action and is quite enthusiastic over the prospect of having an appropriation of $10,000 made by the state legislature for our end of the work.

Now, what I should like to have from you, after giving me the arrangements you have with various States, is an outline of the next steps necessary to secure work in this territory. To what extent will it be necessary for us to petition, and to what extent shall we get the assistance of our Congressmen and Senators in having requests made to your bureau?

Any suggestions that you can give me will be promptly acted upon and the movement started in earnest.

Sincerely, yours,
H. K. BENSON.

United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I am a member of the state legislature and know some little of the work of the Geodetic Survey, and I have just had placed in my hands a copy of the soil survey in the vicinity of Everett. I should be pleased to have you inform me what appropriation should be made by the State of Washington to get this work carried on to completion in the State of Washington. I am advised the department helps those who help themselves, and I would like to have an expression of what this survey would cost and what appropriation should be contributed by the State, and how much annually, to accomplish this result.

Yours, truly,
E. B. PALMER.

Prof. MILTON WHITNEY,
Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Soils, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are having frequent calls for the soil maps which the department has issued for this valley. They are extremely interesting and valuable. Can you tell me where we can get copies for distribution; and if the edition was exhausted, can you tell me whether another edition will be soon issued?

Awaiting a reply at your convenience, I am,
Yours, very truly,
B. A. FOWLER,
President Salt River Valley Water Users' Association.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY,
SOUTH TEXAS GARDEN, FORT BROWN,
Brownsville, Tex., December 22, 1908.

MILTON WHITNEY,
Chief Bureau of Soils, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge your favor of December 14, transmitting a map and report covering the Fort Brown soil survey, for which kindly accept my thanks. A year's experience upon this land shows me that the map and description is remarkably accurate, and these papers will prove of considerable value here in the office.

There are a great many inquiries for copies of the Soil Survey of the Brownsville Area, and we have distributed to people wanting them about 25 copies from this office. I should esteem it a favor if you could send us 25 or 50 more of these bulletins, as our supply is exhausted. The planters and ranchmen about here have spoken very highly of this bulletin, stating that on their own lands the characters of the soil indicated upon the map can be accurately traced.

Thanking you, I am,
Very truly,
E. C. GREEN, In Charge.

United States Department of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The copy of Soil Survey of Lancaster County has been received, and I think it a very valuable publication and should be in the hands of every farmer and landowner in the county.

I have owned land here now three years, and have continually advocated plowing deep, clover and alfalfa, etc., as recommended in this pamphlet. It is almost impossible to convince the old timers, but believe the younger men may yet take heed. I will very much appreciate it if you will kindly send copies of above survey to the following farmers, who own land adjoining mine, in the hope they may profit thereby. I shall call their attention to its importance from a scientific as well as practical importance.

George Stabler, Robert Casey, George Trumble, Mr. Feather, Levi Wilhelm, Louis Rust, Frank Hansen, Havelock, R. F. D.; D. T. Jewett, Waverly, R. F. D.

I could use a few extra copies, if the department will send them to me. Thanking you for the favor, I am,
Respectfully, yours,
IRA E. ATKINSON.

We, the undersigned, as members of the Roxanna Grange, of southern Delaware, desire to express our great appreciation for the most excellent work being done in this section by the Bureau of Soils, through Mr. J. W. Nelson, and we wish to thank our Secretary of Agriculture (Hon. James Wilson) and Professor Whitney, of the Bureau of Soils, for the valuable assistance given us in selecting and testing for us the most suitable types of soil for strawberry growing and other truck crops, and also advising with us as to the preparation and treatment of the various types for these industries.

We consider this work as the most valuable for our farmers that can be taken up, as it will aid us in choosing the soils best adapted to the crops we desire to grow and thereby enable us to avoid the failures in the past by enabling us to plant our crops on soil types which are suited to them.

We therefore hope the Bureau of Soils will continue its good work of educating our farmers on this important question of "our soils."

VIRGINIA AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
Blacksburg, Va., March 31, 1908.

Mr. MILTON WHITNEY,
Chief of Bureau of Soils,
United States Department of Agriculture,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have received 12 copies of your report of the soil survey of Chesterfield County, Va., and thank you for the courtesy. I hope it may be your plan to extend the survey work in this State. I have not been in this State long, but have been here long enough to have heard of the keen interest that many of our people take in this work.

I have just spent a week in deciding locations for tobacco experiment stations, and found your survey of Louisa and Hanover areas very valuable indeed as a guide in determining the best location.

If your files will permit, I shall be glad to have 12 copies of each of the other areas surveyed in Virginia.

Yours, very truly,
S. W. FLETCHER.

DEAR SIR: I have received the soil survey of Montgomery County. It will be very useful to us.

I appreciate the work that the bureau has done in this State, and have occasion very frequently to refer to it.

Yours, very truly,

NORTH MILWAUKEE, WIS.,
January 28, 1908.

Hon. WILLIAM H. STAFFORD,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Would you be so kind to mail me the reports (together with the maps) of the Field Operations of the Division of Soils. I would like to have the first report (1899) and the sixth (1904) report, and all following. I have already the years 1900 to 1903 (second to fifth report). Valuable as they are, I can not miss a single report, for I use them freely to make extracts for our agricultural and horticultural papers. To help both our farmers and intending settlers we can not do better but to distribute the knowledge gained by these documents (what crops to raise on a certain soil in a certain area). And in the future much good will come for our unsettled land in northern Wisconsin, when these districts will be mapped out and the various soils described.

Thanking you in advance for your kindness, I am,
Very truly, yours,
W. A. RICHTER.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, proposing an increase for the Bureau of Soils in the Agricultural Department. I am convinced that the soil survey and investigation work as conducted by this bureau is of great importance and benefit to the farmers of this country, as well as of great value to its commercial interest. I believe that the main opposition to the soil survey springs from a lack of knowledge of its true merits. You take the Members of this House who have been reared on farms or who have had practical experience in farming, and they are all impressed with the importance of the soil survey, almost without exception. It is easy to explain why this is; in fact, it is self-explanatory. These Members of the House have a practical experience in farming; they know something of the trials and obstacles that farmers have to encounter; they are in sympathy with the farmers; they know that the soil survey is a great blessing to the farmer; they know that the farmers are entitled to a great deal more than they are receiving from the Congress of the United States; they want to better conditions on the farms throughout the country; they want to place it in the power of the farmer to better understand, if possible, the soil upon which he is supporting himself, his family, and helping to support the rest of the world; they want to show, if possible, how the yield of the farm can be doubled, thus putting surplus dollars into the pockets of our farmers. No one can do anything successfully unless he knows what he is doing. There are many of our farmers who are running their farms and getting along very well without knowing the classification of the soil upon which they are farming. I know this is a fact—I was raised on a farm and spent many years of my life in farming, and I am running two small farms now.

We all must admit that farming for many years has been conducted not wholly, but almost entirely, without regard to scientific methods. If money can be made in loose farming—I might say in chance farming—how much better would it be if our farmers could be brought to understand that farming is not only a science, but the most important industry of the world, and that it should be conducted upon practical lines under the guidance of scientific methods. The farmers are coming to understand this. The people as a whole are coming to understand it, and farming to-day is being done upon a more scientific and businesslike scale than ever before in the history of the world. The necessity of educated farmers is being recognized more than ever before, and statistics show that within the last few years there has been a great increase in the number of agricultural institutions throughout the country and that farmers are educating their sons and daughters to a greater extent than ever before. This is gratifying, for it means greater things for the agricultural industry. [Applause.]

You will pardon this digression from my subject. This subject of the education of our country boys and girls is one of intense interest to me. I know from actual experience the hardships and obstacles they encounter in an effort to secure knowledge. They are not provided with as good schools and facilities of obtaining an education as the boys and girls in the cities and towns. Any action looking to the improvement of the rural schools has my hearty indorsement, and anything that tends to give assistance to the farmers whereby they will be in better position to supply better educational advantages for their boys and girls also has my support.

Now, then, let us go back to the soil survey. I am so deeply interested in this vital matter of better educational facilities for the boys and girls in the rural districts that I was about to lose sight of the topic I had under discussion.

What is the soil survey for—what are its purposes? I have not the time to go into a full discussion of it, but as I understand it, the object of the work of the Bureau of Soils is to investigate and map out the important soil areas in accordance with their geological relations and their agricultural value. These maps are of such a character as to show farmers or prospective settlers the character of the soil and the nature of the crops or the general classes of crops adapted to the general soil formations of the different regions. The soils adapted to the certain classes of crops should also be thoroughly investigated and mapped so that one could see by consulting the maps the areas adapted to certain classes of tobacco, truck, horticultural, or other crops. Such work forms an essentially new line of agricultural geology, and requires for its successful prosecution persons trained in the difficult problems of surface geology and who have a broad appreciation and knowledge of the relation of soils to crops.

There are still large areas of land along the Atlantic coast and in other parts of the country, so we are told by the Agricultural Department, lying out as waste lands, which are adapted admirably to the raising of early truck crops. There are large areas of land in many of our States, well adapted to the different classes of tobacco and to other agricultural and horticultural crops, which are at present not used to the best advantage, because the relations of the soils to crops are not fully understood or appreciated.

The soil survey and examination work is to help us know the soils, by giving us a scientific investigation, which is to be fully shown upon a soil map showing beyond doubt, and as accurately as can be done, the classification of the soils. Who can say that such an examination is not of vital help to the agricultural interest of the country? What farmer is there in this whole country who would not be glad to get without cost to himself a soil survey of his lands and be furnished a map of that survey showing up the character of his soils, showing what crops it is best adapted to, showing in what plant food his soils are deficient, showing what treatment his soils need? The farmers usually get this knowledge, but how have they been getting it? By experimenting a lifetime, trying first one fertilizer and then another; in many cases it is purely guesswork. Many have lived a long life and died without ever knowing their soils. It just seems to me that this is of the most vital importance to the farmers, and especially the young farmers, or those who are seeking new fields in which to apply the art or science of farming. It strikes me that a young farmer with the benefit of one of these soil surveys, provided with the usual soil map, showing up the character of soils, their crop adaptation, the treatment needed, the best kind of fertilizers to be used, will save not only many years of experimenting, but will save thousands and thousands of dollars that, in my opinion, are now spent uselessly in fertilizers that are misapplied and not what the lands need. This would be a blessing not only to the farmer himself, but to the whole world, for the farmer is the "Atlas" who supports the world. [Applause.]

Showing the many strong points in favor of the Bureau of Soils, I beg to refer here to an article from the New York Tribune, which is as follows:

The greatest fear of the American soil tillers—exhaustion and unproductiveness of land—is rapidly being dispelled by the experiments and investigations of the Bureau of Soils. This branch of the Department of Agriculture has received little advertising; it does its work quietly and the cities hear little of it, but to the great and small farming districts, to the hesitating planter, and to the dependent settler it is a great boon and a daily counselor. It has shown the way to scientific farming; it has made briar patches into grassy, fertile plains; swamps into blooming cornfields; sandy prairies into acres of production. In short, a man can learn in an hour from the Bureau of Soils what his father spent years in ascertaining, and he can learn it with greater accuracy. From a map or a report he can see what crop his land will best produce, what it will not yield, and, perhaps, that it will bring him undreamed of produce and wealth. The Bureau of Soils has made many farmers rich, and the number that make use of the bureau is increasing daily.

Its possibilities seem unlimited; its results at present are extraordinary, but its scope is of necessity limited because of a lack of funds with which to carry on the work completely and comprehensively. The authorities of the bureau, under the direction of Prof. Milton Whitney, have asked for $500,000 for the fiscal year 1909, and they have some assurances that this amount will be appropriated by Congress. Representatives who have studied the workings of the bureau and who have satisfied themselves of its utility say that half a million is insufficient, and that the tremendous advantages it is working to the country, both monetary and otherwise, warrant a much larger expenditure. The authorities of the bureau, however, have been wisely modest in their request and are daily engaged in explaining the work of the institution to all who are interested. What will be accomplished with the $500,000, if it is granted, can best be gauged by a consideration of what has been done with the $200,000 spent in 1907.

In the main, the Bureau of Soils devotes a large portion of its attention to surveying, mapping, and classifying the land of the United States and determining the constituents of soil in such a precise manner that a farmer wishing to plant a certain crop can determine in advance the advisability of such a course by a moment's reference to the report of the bureau. Irrigation and its success must be largely credited to this department. Reclamation owes its inception to the bureau; fertilization and erosion are studied in their most technical phases and reported in simple language, while the transplanting of seed and the adaptability of soil complete the main uses of the bureau.

The maps issued are used not only by farmers and agriculturists but by landowners of all classes, including real estate and railroad men. From every part of the country come requests asking that particular portions of land be surveyed; thousands of maps and reports are asked for, and many letters of appreciation and thanks are on file at the bureau. To chart every necessary portion of land in the country is the ultimate aim, but at present the bureau is ten years behind, even in those regions where a survey will mean a certain and immediate increase in the value of soil. More than 40,000 requests come to the bureau in a year from struggling farmers, from cattle raisers, from important chambers of commerce, from boards of trade, and from various state departments of agriculture and geological surveys. Several States have cooperated with the bureau to a considerable extent, Alabama having given $10,000 for this purpose and, it is said, has received thousands in return. Only a small proportion of the requests can be complied with, as the force of surveyors is small. A systematic plan is being followed out, which in the course of time will give satisfaction to all regions, and which an increased appropriation would greatly facilitate.

That is an able newspaper argument for a good cause.

I wish to quote from a report of the Agricultural Department, which sheds further light upon the real necessity and importance of this soil survey, which is as follows:

The soil is fundamental in its uses. For these reasons the study of the soil must always occupy a fundamental position in the development of the resources of the United States and in the arrangement of its economic conditions. Only within recent years has the great variety which actually exists in the soil resources of the United States been understood. Beginning in 1899 the soil survey of the Bureau of Soils has been engaged in the classification of soils, in the representation, upon soil maps, of the occurrence of the various types discovered, and in the preparation of reports which describe the characteristics and the uses of the different soils encountered. Since the beginning of this work in 1899 approximately 100,000 square miles of the agricultural regions of the United States have been surveyed. Nearly 600 different types of soil have been encountered, and special studies have been made not only of the soils adapted to the growing of the cereal crops, but also of those special-purpose soils which have a high value for the production of fruit of various kinds, of truck, of market-garden crops, of different varieties of tobacco, of sugar beets, and of many newly introduced crops.

Studies along the Atlantic seaboard have demonstrated that the Norfolk sand, Norfolk fine sand, and the Norfolk fine sandy loam are peculiarly adapted to the production of those early vegetables and fruits which furnish the supply for the northern city markets. It has also been shown in this connection that where transportation is adequate land belonging to these three soil types which formerly had a value of $5 an acre can readily be made to have a value of from $100 to $200 an acre for the production of the truck crops.

The recent importance of the rice industry in Louisiana and Texas has led to investigations of the soils best adapted for growing this crop. It has been found that in general the heavy silt loams and clay loams of the Louisiana and Texas seacoast prairies are well adapted to rice production, and it has been upon soils of this character that the wonderful strides in rice production have been made possible.

It was through the soil surveys that the rich tobacco lands of Florida and south Georgia were discovered. Lands that were considered ordinary lands and of small value are now yielding large and valuable crops and are greatly enhanced in value.

I was greatly interested in a speech made during the last session of this Congress by Hon. J. E. ELLERBE of South Carolina, and to further show in this connection the great importance of the soil survey I wish to quote the following from his remarks:

Such was the work on the tobacco soils and to such extent with the tobacco problems that soils are now chosen by the growers in the leading tobacco districts of the United States, and favorable results are certain from the start, and the industry has been placed on a very permanent and profitable basis.

As another illustration, it is found that not only are the different types of soils of widely different value for growing cotton, but also that the different varieties of cotton require different soils for their most profitable growth, and that the working out of the soil preferences for each of the many varieties of that crop is a most necessary and entirely possible problem, the solution of which would save the southern planters hundreds of thousands of dollars each year. Sufficient progress has now been made in soil studies to be certain that many of our crops are not only grown to the best advantage on certain classes of soils, but that the different varieties thereof are very definite in their soil preferences or requirements.

In my own district there are thousands of acres of land planted to cotton and producing $10 to $15 per acre, that could, if devoted to other crops, produce from $100 to $500 per acre. Some men have been pioneers in this great work and deserves the "well done" of every man who delights in the prosperity of his country.

McIver Williamson, of Darlington County, S. C., has revolutionized corn growing in my State and proven that with proper selection, preparation, fertilization, and cultivation of soil from 75 to 150 bushels of corn can be grown per acre instead of 10 to 15 bushels, as formerly.

Captain Drake, of Marlboro County, some years ago contested for the prize of $500 offered by the Orange Judd Publishing Company for the most corn grown on 1 acre. This was open to every State in the Union. He opened the eyes of the people of this country when he grew 254 bushels and 50 pounds of corn on a measured acre of Marlboro land.

Some years ago the managers of the Raleigh and Charleston Railroad, in their efforts to develop the country through which their road ran, sent a man to Marion, S. C., who sold one crop of lettuce from a single acre of Marion soil for more than $1,800.

Captain Westbrook, of North Carolina, made $23,000 above expenses on 20 acres of land, considered by many to be of little value. Strawberries were grown entirely.

There can be no doubt about the soil survey and soil maps being of great help to the farmers. The question is, Are we going to continue to make a farce, so to speak, out of the bureau from which this great help emanates, or are we going to back it up with funds and assistance such as it needs in order that this good work can go forward? I am in favor of making sufficient appropriations for this bureau, so that it will be in position to be of material help to the farmers. We have long since passed the experimental stage with it. It has been abundantly shown that it is one of the most important branches of the Agricultural Department, and that if the work was not so hampered from time to time by small appropriations it could and would result in great blessings to the farmers, and this Bureau of Soils should receive more favorable consideration at the hands of Congress than it does. It is not treated fairly, and by discriminating against it the farmers are discriminated against.

I have known for a long time that the soil survey was a good thing for the farmers, and for nearly two years I have been pleading for soil surveys in certain counties of the district which I represent, particularly for Bulloch County, in which is located, at Statesboro, Ga., the agricultural college for that district. I thought at one time that I almost had the soil survey for Bulloch County, which had been requested through a formal resolution of many of the citizens of that county, but I was doomed to disappointment, for the answer finally came "not now," "not sufficient funds at this time," or words to that effect. I have had it up with the department and with the Bureau of Soils on several occasions, and it is always "a lack of funds" to postpone this important work. [Applause.]

I am tired of that answer; I am tired of the delay. This bureau should be given sufficient funds with which to operate, because, as I have already said, it has long since passed the experimental stage, and it should be permitted to grow and develop in usefulness. It should be properly cared for and permitted to expand its great work. The farmers want it to be taken care of; they want it to expand; and the fact that there are to-day something like 500 applications on file in that bureau for soil surveys in various parts of the United States is sufficient evidence of its merit. The Bureau of Soils has been investigating soil conditions in the United States for over ten years, and in that time there has been only nine soil surveys made in the great State of Georgia, and not a single one of the nine, except the small area at the agricultural college at Statesboro, Ga., is in the First Congressional District. My people want a soil survey, and we must have it; and if we do not get it, I want them to know that I am not to blame in the matter. In the nine soil surveys that have been made thus far in Georgia, I am advised that a total area of 3,300 square miles has been covered, at an expense of less than $9,000. I am advised that, including my requests for soil surveys, there are 31 requests on file for surveys and maps in Georgia at the present time, covering a total of something like 12,350 square miles.

The Chief of the Bureau of Soils, in his annual report, has recommended that $4,500 to $5,000 should be expended annually in Georgia for the conduct of this soil-survey work. He says in his annual report for 1908:

> This work is being done at the request of the governor of Georgia and of other state officials. These officials request and desire that detailed soil-survey maps on the scale of 1 inch to the mile should be made in the 11 counties in Georgia within which the agricultural high schools are located, in order that the results of the experimental work conducted at these high schools may be applied immediately throughout the county surrounding each school. It is thoroughly appreciated by those having the agricultural development of the State and its educational facilities in charge that the value of the work of these schools will be largely increased if such soil surveys can be made at an early date. There are also other agricultural interests, including those of the tobacco growers in southwest Georgia, the fruit growers in central Georgia, and the rice and sea-island cotton growers in eastern Georgia, that are urgently calling for the extension of soil-survey work in these different localities. The amount of money expended in the State might well be increased to $4,500 or $5,000 annually in consideration of the valuable results which might be obtained during the next few years.

Soil surveys already made in Georgia have shown the existence of large areas of low-priced land well suited to the production of both filler and wrapper tobacco, and have aided enormously in the development of the tobacco industry in Georgia. At the present time individuals and corporations desiring to engage in the tobacco industry will only purchase land for that purpose according to the findings of the soil survey. As a result of the soil-survey work in southwest Georgia, the revenue from tobacco paid into the United States Treasury annually has in the last five years increased sufficiently to more than pay the total cost of the soil-survey work in the entire United States. [Applause.]

The soil surveys in central Georgia have aided in the extension and development of the peach industry, and Georgia, because of these soil surveys and of the information about peach soils which is contained in these soil surveys, is rapidly becoming one of the leading peach-producing States.

No soil surveys have yet been made in the Atlantic coast section of Georgia, and work of this character should be undertaken at once, in order to determine the relationship of the soils along the Atlantic coast to those in South Carolina similarly situated and upon which extremely valuable crops of cabbage, lettuce, and other winter vegetables are produced.

Soil surveys are also needed in Georgia to show the character and extent of the swamp lands which are capable of reclamation and agricultural occupation along the seaboard.

The farmers of Georgia are alert and desirous of using every known agency for the improvement of their farm conditions. Since 1880 there has been an increase of 86,000 in the number of Georgia farms. During that length of time there has been an increase of nearly 350,000 acres of land held in farms in the State, while for the same period there has been an increase of nearly two and one-half million acres in the improved land of the State. These figures show (1) that there is an increased demand for Georgia lands; (2) that Georgia farmers are going into intensive farming and are using the land which they possess to increasing advantage; (3) that Georgia farmers are building up for themselves an increasing number of prosperous farm homes. In this same period of time the value of Georgia farms and farm buildings has increased seventy-one and one-half million dollars.

In order that there may be increased specialization in crop production, in order that additional crops suited to Georgia soils and climate may be grown, in order that both the citizens of Georgia and their neighbors throughout the United States may know the exact resources of Georgia soils, these soil surveys must be extended as rapidly as possible throughout the unsurveyed portion of Georgia.

The citizens of Georgia are so much in earnest in desiring to improve their agricultural conditions and in desiring to develop their agricultural resources that they have provided 11 agricultural colleges, 1 for each of the 11 congressional districts of the State. They have requested, through their state officials, through their local boards of trade, through various farmers' organizations, and through their Representatives in Congress, that this soil-survey work should be extended as a sure foundation for additional growth in agricultural wealth and prosperity. The farmers of Georgia annually contribute their share to the support of the Federal Government, and they annually desire their just share in the work which the Bureau of Soils and the United States Department of Agriculture are doing for the improvement of farm conditions and the increase of agricultural efficiency.

There are now on file requests for over 500 additional soil surveys in the United States, covering an area of more than 500,000 square miles.

It would take the present force of the Bureau of Soils ten years to comply with these requests under the appropriation as it exists, and more new requests are placed on file each year than can be complied with during that year.

Since May 1, 1899, when the soil-survey work was first begun, surveys have been made of 160,000 square miles, located in 44 different States and 2 Territories.

The cost of this field work has been a little over $400,000, and the demand for this class of work for the last seven years has been far in excess of any of the sums appropriated for its conduct.

The soils of the United States constitute its greatest economic resource, and, unlike the mines, the forests, and the fisheries, the soils are usually held by small individual owners, who have not the facilities for securing expert advice which lie within the reach of great corporations and extensive mill operators. The farmers of the United States, who own its soil, must depend largely upon the investigations and knowledge of the United States Department of Agriculture and their own state experiment stations for expert knowledge and businesslike advice.

The people not only want these soil surveys and soil maps of their lands, but they are clamoring for them. We can a great deal better make appropriations for a productive and important interest of this kind than for huge battle ships costing into the millions, in the building and maintenance of which we are literally wasting the people's money. I am opposed to all such extravagant and wasteful appropriations, and think it is high time that the Government, which is now at peace with the rest of the world, should cease to increase its already unreasonable appropriations for a larger army and a larger navy. These large and extravagant appropriations should and could be applied with better advantage and with better grace to the payment of the public debt and to purposes that will be productive instead of destructive to the Nation's wealth.

I want to see the appropriations for the Agricultural Department generally increased until that department, which is intended to help the farmers, is in a position to really do what it was intended that it should do. The appropriations that are made for the benefit of the farmers are so miserably small as compared with the other appropriations that they are all out of proportion. It seems that Congress never dreams of real economy in making appropriations until appropriations are to be made for the agricultural interests, then economy is had, as usual, at the expense of the farmers. [Applause.]

Before concluding my remarks upon this very important matter, I wish to submit an extract from the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Soils, which will further illustrate the value of this work to the American farmers:

PHYSICAL AND CHEMICAL INVESTIGATIONS.

During the last fiscal year the Bureau of Soils has made mechanical analyses of about 2,000 soils for the use of the Soil Survey of the Bureau. It has made upward of 800 chemical examinations of soils for the field parties of the bureau, and about 4,500 chemical examinations of soils, drainage waters, and fertilizers for other bureaus and outside parties entitled to such assistance. The bureau has devised several new forms of apparatus and new methods for the analysis of soils, descriptions of which have been given in appropriate places in literature. Besides this routine work, the laboratories have continued investigations upon the fundamental properties of soils. The absorption of vapors, especially water vapor and carbon dioxide, has been thoroughly investigated, as well as the absorption of dissolved substances from solution, properties of the utmost importance as affecting the physical condition of soils. The retention of soluble fertilizers and the reclamation of soils "affected by alkali" have been studied, and the investigations which have been carried on for some years past by this bureau and the results obtained by other investigators in these lines of investigation throughout the world have been brought together and made available for scientific workers in two bulletins of this bureau. Work has been continued on the closely related subjects of flocculation and sedimentation, with results which throw light not only on the physical structure and arrangement of the soils, but also on the nature of flowing waters and soil wastage, etc., and the investigation of this subject is now being actively continued.

I sincerely hope that this amendment to increase the appropriation for the Bureau of Soils will be agreed to, for I think it is one of the most meritorious appeals that has been before Congress during this session. It will be money spent for a good purpose in a field that will prove of vast benefit to the agricultural and commercial interests of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. POLLARD. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the Bureau of Soils make chemical analyses of soils?

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. That is my understanding, that they examine soils.

Mr. POLLARD. The gentleman is in error when he says they make chemical analyses of soils.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. What is the gentleman's understanding of the analysis that is made?

Mr. POLLARD. They simply make a physical analysis of the soil.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Do they not determine the chemical properties of the soil as well?

Mr. POLLARD. Not at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand it, the Bureau of Soils, in making an examination, determine what class of soil a particular specimen is, and at times they make chemical analyses of the soil where it is necessary; but they determine the class of soil it belongs to, so that they will know how to apply scientific agriculture to the particular soil that is on a man's farm.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. I am not so far wrong, then, when I say they do make chemical analyses.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Sometimes.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Georgia is doubtless acquainted with Dr. H. C. White, of Georgia University?

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. Appearing before the Committee on Agriculture and asked whether he believed that any beneficial result had come from the soil survey in the State of Georgia, he said:

I can not now recall that any advantage has come to our farming interests.

Does the gentleman think he is qualified to pass upon that subject?

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. I will reply to the gentleman in this way: That there has never been a sufficient amount of work done by the Bureau of Soils in the State of Georgia upon which to fix an intelligent conclusion. We have not had a thorough test.

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman think Doctor White would express a conclusion that was not intelligent?

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. I think Doctor White is entirely wrong on this proposition. I have a high regard for him, but I differ with him in this. Doctor White is like a great many other gentlemen who are trying to conduct farming at long range and telling the farmers what they need without having practical experience themselves. I know Doctor White well and I have a high regard for him, but I disagree with him in this instance.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman say that the Bureau of Soils or anybody connected with it has had any practical experience in farming?

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Yes; I think there are a great many practical farmers who are connected with it.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is really convinced, then, that the work of the Bureau of Soils is of some use to the farmers of the country?

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Yes; I am thoroughly convinced of that fact.

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MACON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he can call to mind a single farmer who ever profited by any soil survey made by the National Government?

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Yes; I can in my own State.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Georgia may continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia may continue for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to say that I have one of the largest farms in the State of Illinois, which I operate, and in connection with which I have never asked or received any information from the Bureau of Soils.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. That accounts for the lack of knowledge which the gentleman displays on the floor, because he has not investigated this bureau and does not know what it is really doing. I am a farmer, and was raised on a farm, and have made some study of this matter. I have become thoroughly convinced, although I may not be able to convince the gentleman from Illinois, that the Bureau of Soils is a great thing for the farmer.

Mr. MACON. I want to ask the gentleman a further question. I want to know in what respect any farmer has ever been benefited by a soil survey made by the National Government?

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. We have but one soil survey in my district, the first district, which I have the honor to represent. That survey is a small one, and was made under the direction of the Bureau of Soils, I think, and was made on the site where the agricultural college is located at Statesboro; and they have profited greatly, as I understand it, through this survey. They have had only a small number of surveys made in the State, and I have talked with many farmers about them, and have learned that great good has resulted from these soil surveys.

I understand further that through the soil survey the tobacco lands of southwest Georgia, as I stated a while ago, were discovered, and that the tobacco lands of Florida were found to be adapted to the growing of that fine grade of tobacco that they are now producing.

Mr. MACON. The gentleman claims that this great improvement came from the investigation of the Bureau of Soils?

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. I do.

Mr. MACON. I am anxious to do anything to better the condition of the farmers, and I am trying to find out something about it. I have never heard any farmer say that he got any benefit from this Bureau of Soils. I am trying to find out about it.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. I have told you of those that we have in my State, and I have looked into it with some care. I would like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question. Have you had a survey made in your district?

Mr. MACON. No; but they have right across the river from me.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the farmers of Texas have benefited immensely by these soil surveys. The land in certain regions there was used only for grazing, and since investigations by the Bureau of Soils the great rice industry has assumed enormous proportions in these regions. The Bureau of Soils has also made important discoveries as to the practicability of growing tobacco in certain parts of Texas.

Mr. MACON. And it was the result of the surveys by the Bureau of Soils?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was; and I consider it one of the most valuable bureaus of the Government.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. It is my information that it is a good thing, and the gentleman from Arkansas ought to go to the Bureau of Soils, or get in touch with it, and get a soil survey in the State of Arkansas, and if possible in his district, and learn something of this great work from practical experience. [Applause.]

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that the gentleman from Georgia began his speech by stating that he has looked into the question of soil surveys with great care, and then in the next statement says that the soil survey is a chemical analysis of the soil. In the first place, the experts in this department do not claim to make any chemical analysis of the soil.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What do they do?

Mr. POLLARD. They classify the soil.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What do you mean by "classify?"

Mr. POLLARD. They have divided the soils of the United States into about 400 different classes, and they go to a locality and classify that soil. They say this is marsh loam, and this is silt loam, and so forth; and, as I say, it is nothing but a description or classification of the soil. The soil survey is a physical, and not a chemical, analysis.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Do I understand you to say that they divide the soil into about four classes?

Mr. POLLARD. Four hundred classes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. If they have divided the soil into 400 classes and the farmer knows what each class is peculiarly adapted to, does not the gentleman think that in that way it will do the farmer a great deal of good?

Mr. POLLARD. If that was the case, I would say yes.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Is not it the case?

Mr. POLLARD. It is not the case at all, and there is the trouble with the whole proposition. The trouble with the soil surveys is this: That the soil surveys they send out over the country—and it is not alone confined to my part of the country, but to the South and East and every other part of the country—are oftentimes filled with as much misinformation or false information as with matters of fact.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Then, what does the committee provide for any of them for?

Mr. POLLARD. I will state, Mr. Chairman, I made these strong assertions at the beginning simply to attract the attention of the committee to what I propose to show. The committee is in favor of certain features of the work of the soil survey. The trouble with the question is that it is all yet an experimental question. It is an investigational question. We have not reached any conclusions yet that have been recognized by scientists of the United States or of the world.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POLLARD. I will not yield to any more questions now until I make my statement. Then I will yield. The whole work is in an experimental stage, and the greatest harm that comes to the country from these soil surveys comes from the fact that a man goes into a certain part of the country and makes a soil survey, and he classifies the soil, and then he goes ahead and undertakes to tell what will grow in this kind of soil and what will grow in that kind of soil when he may not know a thing in the world about it. There is the trouble with the whole situation.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. POLLARD. I can not yield now. I will yield later if I have time. I want to make my statement. It is all an unknown problem. So far as their work is investigational we are heartily in favor of it. We want they should continue the investigations as far as possible, and we are in hopes that they will reach some conclusion somewhere along the line that we can tie to and we will know what we are talking about when we get out bulletins. As an instance of that to which I have referred, I want to call the attention of the committee to the hearings of last year. As an illustration of what the bureau undertakes to do, I read from page 397 of the hearings of this year. I asked Mr. Whitney, the chief of the bureau, who was then before the committee, this question:

> May I ask you whether you do any work of any experimental character with fruit?

His reply is:

> Only so far as this—and I should like, if it would not have seemed discourteous, to have corrected Mr. UNDERWOOD in some of his remarks, as he preceded me. The only work we do in fruit is to study the adaptation of soils to fruit, and beyond that we do nothing—that is to say, we can determine from our soil surveys and from our utilization work the character of the soil that is adapted not only to any kind of fruit, but to any variety of fruit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POLLARD. I ask unanimous consent to continue for ten minutes.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. I object unless the gentleman will yield.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. POLLARD. I think the gentleman had ten minutes.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Yes; but "the gentleman from Georgia" yielded very courteously to the gentleman from Nebraska when he was asked to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the objection if the gentleman will yield to a question in the ten minutes.

Mr. POLLARD. I have no objection to being interrupted when I make my statement, but I can not make a statement and be interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to continue for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POLLARD. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says that the Bureau of Soils does not undertake to do any chemical examination. I hold in my hand the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Soils for 1908, by Mr. Whitney, the chief of the bureau, and on page 27 I find the following:

> During the last fiscal year the Bureau of Soils has made mechanical analyses of about 200 soils for the use of the soil survey of the bureau. It has made upward of 800 chemical examinations of soils for the field parties of the bureau and about 4,500 chemical examinations of soils, drainage waters, and fertilizers for other bureaus and outside parties entitled to such assistance.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I do not care about the gentleman using up my ten minutes in reading an article to the House. My statement was this, that in the soil surveys that are made in the field, which are mapped and distributed, no chemical analysis of the soil is made. On that question I am right, and I challenge the gentleman from Georgia to show to the contrary. They do make chemical analyses here in the bureau; there is no doubt about that. When samples of soil are sent in to the chemist in the bureau they make a chemical analysis of them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. POLLARD. The gentleman from Alabama can not interrupt me. If the gentleman desires to ask me a question, all right; but I can not yield to him to make a speech.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to know if the gentleman does not know that when a forest survey is made in the field they bring the soil they get in the field to the laboratory and make a chemical analysis of it?

Mr. POLLARD. What I know is this, and the gentleman knows the same thing if he has investigated the question, that the soil surveys made broadcast over the country are not a chemical analysis of the soil at all. They are a physical analysis of the soil, wherein the soils are simply classified. Now, Mr. Chairman, this bureau has not only undertaken to go into the field and make a survey of the soil and tell whether apples can be grown or grapes can be grown there, but they also pretend to be able to tell what variety of grapes or apples can be grown. Now, this statement of Mr. Whitney's, which I was reading when interrupted, is absurd on its face, and to any thinking man is ridiculous.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POLLARD. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. If the Bureau of Soils only guesses at what it does, would it not be a good idea to abolish it?

Mr. POLLARD. No; I do not think so, and I will tell the gentleman why I do not think so.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman admit they are only guessing at their work?

Mr. POLLARD. About half the time they guess right and about the other half of the time they guess wrong.

Mr. MADDEN. Then they must be guessing all the time, if they only guess right about half the time.

Mr. POLLARD. That is true. This statement, however, only applies to the advice given. The soil surveys themselves are accurate, so far as I know. As I said a moment ago, if the gentleman will give his attention, the investigational work they perform is of very great value, and that ought to be encouraged and carried on to the greatest extent. As an illustration of the point I have made, they went out into this same country from which the gentleman from Georgia comes, covering parts of Georgia, Florida, Alabama, and Louisiana. After this soil survey was made, they told the people down there that the character of those soils were such that they could grow the finer grades of tobacco. They told them that they could grow Sumatra tobacco, the most valuable tobacco that is grown. The people who lived there believed this report of the Soils Bureau, simply because it came from the Government of the United States. They had confidence in it because they did not believe that the Government would send out any information unless it was reliable. Consequently, they began to grow the Sumatra tobacco, and the result was that millions of dollars worth of Sumatra tobacco were grown down there which was of such an inferior quality that the people could not market it——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I challenge that——

Mr. POLLARD (continuing). And they have not had a market for that——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I challenge the gentleman's statement on that proposition.

Mr. POLLARD. I have been informed to-day by a gentleman who has been on the ground that now there are upward of a million dollars' worth of tobacco in that country that the farmers can not sell simply because it is of such poor quality that it will not meet the demands of the trade. The business there has been virtually ruined on that account.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know the gentleman will not stand for a statement unless it is true——

Mr. POLLARD. Certainly not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A part of that Sumatra tobacco is raised in my district, and I know there has not been any of it that has been raised there that has not been sold for a good profit, and they are selling it to-day. Now, I challenge the gentleman to say where this tobacco has been raised that could not be sold. I know it has always been sold in my district, and at a profit.

Mr. POLLARD. Of course, I will admit the gentleman from Alabama knows more about what is being done in his district than I do, but I want to say this, that the information I received came from a man who has been on the ground and who has investigated the work——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Tell us who he is.

Mr. POLLARD. I can not do that. He is a man who went down there from the Bureau of Plant Industry after the work of the Bureau of Soils was found to be a failure. When they found they could not grow the high-grade tobacco with success, then they called upon the Bureau of Plant Industry to help them out. A man from the Plant Bureau was sent to save the property from loss. He has been compelled to develop by breeding a new species of that Sumatra tobacco that is acclimated to that country and can be grown at a profit.

I am told, also, that the same conditions prevailed up in the State of Connecticut, where they undertook to give advice concerning a matter that they had very little, if any, information about. They told the farmers of Connecticut they could grow Sumatra tobacco if planted and cultivated under shade. The shades were made at great expense, millions of dollars invested, and failure was the result. Again the Plant Bureau had to come in and develop by breeding a species of this tobacco that would grow in Connecticut. The trouble is that these men are soil men. They are not plant men. They make an analysis of the soil, and without taking into account the habits of the plant, without taking into account at all times the climatic conditions as well, they undertake to tell the farmers what they can do. and it oftentimes proves that their judgment is wrong.

The position of the committee on this matter is this, that we ought to go slowly, and that is why we did not increase the appropriation for this bureau. We thought that they ought to be required, so far as is possible, to confine their work to research work, to experimental work, and to investigational work, and not branch out into other lines until we know where we are, until we are sure of our ground; and we have not yet reached that point.

I can state other instances. Another instance occurred in the State of California, where the soil men had gone into the State and examined the soils in a particular region in the Sacramento Valley, I believe it was. They said the soil had a disease which prevented the people from raising potatoes. Last year Congress took from the Bureau of Soils the research work they had been doing and turned it over to the Bureau of Plant Industry, and this work was put on the latter bureau. They sent a man out there, and they found that the trouble was not a soil problem at all, but that there was a disease of the tuber, a disease of the potato plant, that was making the trouble. It was not a soil problem in any sense of the word.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. POLLARD. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Do the investigations of the Bureau of Soils throw any light on the question of fertilizers to enable the farmers to select more intelligently the kind of fertilizers that should be put on their crops?

Mr. POLLARD. To a limited extent I think that is true.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman, as I have never understood exactly, what the misinformation is that they are sending about over the country?

Mr. POLLARD. The misinformation I have just stated concerning the care of tobacco in the South, notably in the State of Florida and other parts of the South.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. That is a result of this investigational work that I understand the gentleman is in favor of?

Mr. POLLARD. They went in there and made a survey of the soil, and they told the people there that they could grow a particular type of tobacco. And when they came to grow the tobacco they found it did not grow successfully.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Let me see if I understand the situation. I am asking for information. It is the gentleman's idea and it is the committee's idea that they ought to ascertain the facts and not express an opinion on them?

Mr. POLLARD. No, sir. We want them to ascertain the facts. That is the trouble. They publish stuff that does not prove to be the facts. What we want them to do is to go slow and know their ground, and not publish any information until they are sure they are right. That is all. The fact is that we know very little about the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I favor this amendment, and I want to say to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture that I have not read the testimony of Doctor White given before that committee; but I know him to be a gentleman of very high literary attainments; a member of the faculty of the State University, at Athens, Ga., from which I graduated; a gentleman whom I personally know and that, too, very pleasantly. I understood the gentleman to read from his testimony in which he disapproved of the appropriation for soil surveys. There has been for some years past a difference between Doctor White and the practical farmers of the State on this and other matters as to the best methods to be used in advancing education in agriculture and in the application of the fund appropriated for the benefit of agricultural colleges. Doctor White lives in the city of Athens, the most aristocratic city in our State, and where the State University has always been situated, and there has been an effort going on to remove the experiment station from Griffin to Athens. While I have the utmost confidence in Doctor White as a teacher and a professor in the University of Georgia and in his sincerity, there are many farmers in the State of Georgia and in my own district, where some of these surveys have been made, whose opinions as to whether this survey has been of any practical benefit to the farmer or not I would readily accept in preference to his.

Now, I hold in my hand the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, and I want to read what is stated in reference to some of the soil surveys and the benefits that have resulted therefrom:

> The importance of the soil survey as a factor in national development may be judged from the fact that the value of the annual products of the soil has now reached $8,000,000,000, and in the conservative estimate of the experts of the Bureau of Soils this stupendous amount might easily be doubled within the next twenty years through a complete comprehension of the full capabilities of soils now cultivated and the discovery of the proper uses for soils not now cultivated. Such an undertaking is worthy the careful consideration of all who desire the present achievements of American agriculture to be surpassed by those of the immediate future and by all who desire to provide a secure foundation for all the industrial activities of the Nation.

I do not like that word "Nation" very much. Still, I will have to accept it.

The necessities of that population for which the United States must provide under normal conditions of increase of population demand that all agencies leading to the increased efficiency of soils should be fostered.

We foster and protect manufactures of all kinds; spend a hundred millions and more for battle ships a year, and many millions more which in no way add to or increase our material wealth—and surely the insignificant sum asked for to aid in increasing the products of agriculture should not meet such strenuous opposition.

Further on:

One of the most notable accomplishments of the Bureau of Soils is the development and extension of the tobacco industry in southern Georgia and northern Florida, in Alabama, and in east Texas, whereby the area planted to tobacco has been more than doubled since the inception of soil-survey work in the regions, and the profits derived by the farmers have been more than quadrupled in the last six years.

A statement, so far as Georgia is concerned, which I am satisfied is a fact——

Mr. SCOTT. May I inquire from what the gentleman is reading?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. From the report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1908.

Mr. SCOTT. I presume the Chief of the Bureau of Soils wrote that part of the report which the gentleman has been reading.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Certainly he did.

Mr. SCOTT. He is hardly a competent witness in a matter of his own work.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. He is not asking for this.

Mr. SCOTT. You are very much mistaken.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that so far as the Chief of the Bureau of Soils is concerned, and the expert men whom we employ for the purpose of making these soil surveys, I would take their statement over that of Doctor White, elegant and accomplished gentleman as he is. Now, this report states further:

In the Gulf States the development of special industries along the coast is showing uses for lands which have been previously considered of little or no agricultural importance, and lands once held at a nominal value for their timber stand now have a greater value for agricultural lands, even after the timber has been removed. This is largely due to the fact that their agricultural uses have been shown by a number of well-located soil surveys.

Do I understand the gentleman to discredit the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Soils, which has been transmitted to us by the Secretary of Agriculture with his apparent approval?

Mr. SCOTT. All I undertook to say was that it would be a poor chief of a bureau who would not claim that the work of his bureau was of use.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. It would be a poor and unworthy chief of a bureau who, when the work was not satisfactory or of no value, had not accomplished the results that were desired, would not have the honesty to tell Congress of it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have about three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time may be extended three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCOTT. There were four gentlemen before us connected with the National Association of Agricultural Colleges during this past year, each of whom testified that, in their judgment, the value of the work of the Bureau of Soils had been grossly exaggerated. Does not the gentleman think that their opinion is entitled to great weight?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman tell us their positions? I do not ask for their names.

Mr. SCOTT. They are connected with state agricultural colleges and experiment stations—Doctor White, Doctor Jordan, Doctor Stone, and Professor Curtiss.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Doctor White is the president of the agricultural college at Athens, and the experiment station for Georgia is in my district; and the survey of the lands in the county where it is located was made at my request, and at the instance of many prominent farmers.

Mr. SCOTT. Doctor White stated that a survey had been made on the experimental farm over which he had control, and he did not regard it of sufficient importance to consider it.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Doctor White, I apprehend, did not know what I know of the great number of applications that are made for information on this subject.

Mr. SCOTT. Then the State of Georgia better employ a more efficient man to protect its agricultural interests.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. A great many farmers in Georgia might agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. CANDLER. Does the gentleman know that the files of the Bureau of Soils are filled with requests for soil surveys, many of them coming from agricultural colleges?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes, sir; I do know it; and know it by reason of the fact that that has been given me as the reason why surveys could not be made in my district when asked for. All I desire to add is, that if the real farmers were consulted more by the committee we would be better informed what the farmers need. In the county in my district when the survey of the soils has been made, and it happens to be the one referred to by Doctor White, I know the farmers believe it has been of benefit. I am sorry Doctor White should express the opinion he does, as it is not sustained by the information I have received on the subject.

Mr. SCOTT. I believe the time has been equally divided between the two sides, and I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in twenty minutes. I believe that will be satisfactory.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. I do not think that the time has been fairly divided.

The CHAIRMAN. Pretty nearly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would say half an hour would be satisfactory, if the time could be equally divided between the two sides.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent that debate close on this paragraph and amendments thereto in thirty minutes, the time to be equally divided between the two sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in thirty minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas and myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LAMB. Who controls the time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I would like to get permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, it is of course very difficult to say anything in two minutes; but in view of the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD], who challenges absolutely any benefits to be derived from the work which is being done by the Bureau of Soils, and in view of his statement that the experts who have made these soil surveys make reports which are practically valueless, I feel that in justice to the House and to myself I should say a word in reference to some surveys which have been made in my own district. The surveys there have developed the fact that alfalfa, which is one of the most beneficial crops now being raised in the United States and one of the most profitable, can be raised upon lands which heretofore were not thought at all suitable for the production of it. The information was given by the soil-survey experts in their report. This has been followed up by actual experiments by the farmers themselves, which have demonstrated the fact that the information given by those experts was absolutely reliable and that it could be depended upon, and the actual results which have come from the experiments made show the value of the soil survey. My observation is that some scientists may believe and these so-called "agriculturists" may think that these soil surveys are of no value; but whenever you get down to the soil itself and investigate it and analyze it and determine what crops can be grown upon it, it has been demonstrated oftentimes and in almost every instance that the information given by this bureau is of great value to the farmer himself. He is the man whom I am anxious always to benefit and to help, because, as I said upon this floor the other day, whenever you help him you help every other calling, business, and avocation of every other citizen of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN].

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to say what benefits have resulted to other States from the soil survey, but I do know that it has been of very great service to the State of Florida. An investigation was started in my State some time ago, as was stated by the gentleman from Nebraska, to determine the adaptability of certain soils in Florida for the production of tobacco, and as a result of those surveys large tobacco fields were established, yielding a very great income to those engaged in the business. Furthermore, these tobacco growers have produced and are producing a very fine quality of Sumatra tobacco; in fact, I think I risk nothing in asserting that they are producing a finer grade than the imported article, perhaps the finest and best that is being grown in this country. Only a few sections of the State were touched by these surveys, but as a result tobacco is being grown in large quantities in Pasco County, in the middle portion of the peninsula, and in Gadsden, Leon, and Jefferson counties, in the northern part of the State; and I have no doubt that if the investigations by the bureau were continued as they ought to be carried on soil well adapted to the growth of tobacco would be found in other portions of Florida.

I want to say further in this connection that the gentleman from Nebraska is entirely mistaken when he says, as I understood him to say, that the tobacco produced in Florida is useless and can not be sold; that while those engaged in the survey reported that they had found soil adapted to the growth of tobacco, that mistakes were made by those who acted upon the report of the bureau and, undertaking to grow tobacco not suited to the soil, had made failures, producing an article that could not be sold at remunerative prices, and that hence the business was languishing. This I deny, for, from the very beginning, the tobacco growers have received satisfactory prices for their products. It is true that during last year, for reasons which we can all understand, the price of tobacco was not as high as it had been theretofore; but the producers, knowing that they have a good article, one that could and should command fair returns, are holding for higher prices, and will no doubt get them.

I was down in the tobacco-growing section of northern Florida a few days ago and talked with several people engaged in that industry, and instead of finding them discouraged, as one would suppose from the remarks of the gentleman, I found them still enthusiastic over the results, as they expect within a very short time to be able to market the entire output of last year at fair prices.

Mr. POLLARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have only a few minutes, and I hope the gentleman will excuse me.

Mr. Chairman, this work of the soil survey has not been carried on as yet to any great extent, comparatively speaking. I have been making an effort for the past two or three years to have it carried further, but without satisfactory results, owing to a lack of money with which to conduct it. Some gentleman here a moment ago said, as if apologizing for the bureau, that all one had to do to obtain a survey was to go to the department and ask it to be made and that it would be done. My experience, however, does not sustain that assertion, for I have been there time and again and have uniformly received the same answer—that the department did not have money enough to carry on surveys for the various States as rapidly as they should be carried on and as the department wished to carry them on. I am therefore in favor of this amendment, which proposes to increase the amount recommended by the committee, as I desire, within reasonable bounds of course, to place at the disposal of the department all the money it may need to perform this very important service, for important it is. It has been intimated here that the department was not only getting all the money it needed, but practically all it wished. I do not so understand the language of the Secretary of Agriculture in his annual reports, to say nothing of statements that have been made to me from time to time by department officials.

The Secretary of Agriculture, in his report for 1908, undertakes to show the importance of these surveys by stating their character and the extent to which they have been carried. Let me read a paragraph or two from this report:

> A soil survey determines the exact character of the various soils, and their location and extent in each area is studied. It also ascertains their present use and capabilities by personal observation of the field force and the report of practical farmers owning and operating the soils and the farms investigated. It summarizes all of the present knowledge of these soils, whether obtained from the farmers who are cultivating them, from the chemical, physical, and fertility investigations of the bureau's laboratories, or from the experimental and research work of the various State institutions concerned. It also enables all soil investigators and agricultural experimenters, as well as the farmers, to make direct comparisons between the soils of any one locality and of all others in the United States. It presents an unprejudiced statement of fact concerning each soil and its uses in each area, and, wherever possible, also forecasts and advises additional and more profitable occupation for each soil. It presents to the farmer a statement of what the full capabilities of his soils are and of the crops produced and methods of cultivation and soil management employed throughout the region in the successful handling of these soils. It gives to the investor and the home seeker those statements of fact concerning soil and agricultural conditions which are essential to insure safe investment and a satisfactory home. It calls attention to the undeveloped soils and their capabilities and the lines of their safe occupation and profitable development. It serves as a summary of the best that is known about soils and a forecast of the best than can be discovered. Such service is essential to the individual welfare of the citizen and to the well-balanced, systematic development of the national soil resources.
> The importance of the soil survey as a factor in national development may be judged from the fact that the value of the annual products of the soil has now reached $8,000,000,000, and in the conservative estimate of the experts of the Bureau of Soils this stupendous amount might easily be doubled within the next twenty years through a complete comprehension of the full capabilities of soils now cultivated and the discovery of the proper uses for soils not now cultivated. Such an undertaking is worthy the careful consideration of all who desire the present achievements of American agriculture to be surpassed by those of the immediate future and by all who desire to provide a secure foundation for all the industrial activities of the Nation. The necessities of that population for which the United States must provide under normal conditions of increase of population demand that all agencies leading to the increased efficiency of soils should be fostered.

Certainly a system which produces such results as these is well worthy of being fostered to any reasonable extent by Congress, and the appropriation proposed by the committee, enlarged as this amendment would enlarge it, would not be in excess of the amount required. Indeed, I think it could profitably be increased to a still greater amount.

Still further on the Secretary gives the results of the soil-survey investigations in some of the Southern States, as follows:

> In the Gulf States the development of special industries along the coast is showing uses for lands which have previously been considered of little or no agricultural importance, and lands once held at a nominal value for their timber stand now have a greater value as agricultural lands even after the timber has been removed. This is largely due to the fact that their agricultural uses have been shown by a number of well-located soil surveys.

And in his report for 1907, in speaking of the results of these investigations in the matter of tobacco growing, he says:

> As a direct result of the soil surveys and of the laboratory investigations, the possibility of producing a finer textured tobacco wrapper leaf in the Connecticut Valley was taken up, and it has been developed to a point where it is assured that a leaf approaching the Sumatra tobacco in texture, but with other local and distinctive characteristics, has been produced in the Connecticut Valley; and largely as a result of the bureau's work in Florida, the American-grown wrapper leaf has taken a foremost rank, is being exported to foreign countries, and is taking its place in real competition with the Sumatra leaf. The interest in this shade-grown product has grown to large proportions and the extension of this industry is contingent to a very large extent upon the soil surveys which shall point out the soils upon which this desirable leaf can be produced.

No suggestion there that the grower has been misled to his injury; on the contrary, it is shown that he has greatly prospered by the information given him by the department.

Hence it will be seen that the Secretary places, and very properly so, too, great store by the soil surveys, and states not extravagantly but conservatively the great benefits which have accrued to those sections of the country, including Florida, where this work has been carried on.

Mr. Chairman, one of the greatest problems now claiming the attention of the legislator in this country is how best to decentralize urban population, how best to check the tendency of the individual to leave the farm and go to the city. A partial solution of this great problem may be found in pointing the industrious and enterprising farmer to the land, no matter where located, out of which he can get the best results for his labor; in giving him information as to the soil where he may produce those special crops which will bring him better returns than ordinary farming. Such may be done in almost any section of the country, and particularly in Florida, where nearly every product of the farm, the orchard, and the garden may be produced. These soil surveys will, by furnishing this much-needed information, accomplish great good along the lines just suggested.

Some one says, however, that we should go slowly, doing a little this year, a little next, and so on, thus spreading the work over a number of years, as if there was merit in long delay. But if it is important to do the work at all, as it certainly is, why not accomplish it as early as possible? That, to my idea, would be the wise course to pursue, and the only way to do it would be to furnish adequate appropriations, which we have not been making heretofore. I therefore hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I do not know much about soil surveys, because there has been so little of it done around my country. There has been, as the map before you shows, some surveys made on the Salt and Colorado rivers. I am informed by various boards of trade in telegrams received yesterday that these soil surveys have been of great value in the selection of soil for appropriate crops. I am very much in favor of this amendment, providing always that a little more of it comes to Arizona. [Laughter.] We have tracts of land containing a vast number of acres of the finest soil in the world, but it is difficult for sparsely settled populations to ascertain by costly experiment what crops can be most profitably grown upon it. Without detaining the committee, I should like to say that this amendment I hope will pass, if the appropriation will give to the soils of that Territory a little more investigation. It is more needed in the West than elsewhere, for the reasons indicated. I have no doubt that vast tracts of land lying in many fertile valleys in Arizona, the great value of which is yet unknown, may shortly become the most fruitful fields on earth, when the anxious homeseeker is informed, through the publication of scientific experiments, of the crops to which these lands are peculiarly adapted.

But if these soil surveys are to be confined to old and thickly settled agricultural districts, I doubt whether the appropriation should be enlarged. These experiments should be largely confined to government lands, with the purpose of building homes in the waste places rather than on soils that have been cultivated by intelligent farmers for the last fifty or one hundred years.

I have little doubt that certain districts in Arizona could grow the finest tobacco in the world. But who is to ascertain this fact? The poor settler is not able to do it. He can barely make a good living on his little homestead entry in the desert by raising the crops costing the least labor. He can not afford to hire help to experiment on the agricultural possibilities of the soil. I am sure the finest cotton in the world can be grown on thousands of acres of the public domain in Arizona. Soil surveys should reveal to the cotton growers this fact and make the growing of that staple a great western industry. I hope the amendment will be adopted, but whether it is or not, I sincerely hope that a much larger sum than usual under this soil-survey appropriation may be dedicated to its fittest purpose, in pointing out to the homeseeker the lands on which, by industry and intelligent work, he may find shelter and comfort for his family on a farm and under a roof all his own.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the soil survey, if properly made and afterwards followed by demonstrations as to what particular plant that soil is adapted, is of the utmost importance to the farmer. It has been demonstrated in the State of Arkansas that rice growing has been made profitable, and that land that was formerly worth but $2 is now worth $75 per acre.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that these soil surveys should be made wherever it is possible to do so. In a new country where the land is rich and where it will produce almost any kind of a crop it is not necessary; but in the old countries where farming has been going on for years and years until the land is worn out and no longer produces good crops, it is necessary to know the elements that are in that soil and to know the elements that are not in there in order to supply the proper elements lacking to produce the best crops for which that particular soil is capable. You can not know that unless you know what is in the soil.

The farmer can not know the profitable crops adapted to his land unless he knows the elements that are necessary are in the land. If any of the elements are lacking, it is necessary to place them there to produce the crop that is desired. When this is done, the tilling of the soil is brought down to a scientific basis, and it can only be done in this way.

The State of Illinois is doing a great work in soil survey under the direction of Prof. C. G. Hopkins, of the State University. He has demonstrated to the farmers of that State the importance of knowing all about the soil and how to supply the missing elements. Through the proper survey of the soil and the demonstration of the particular crop to which it is adapted his assistance has been of great benefit to our people. I am sure we appreciate it in that State very much. The benefit of the analysis of the soil enables our farmers to know how to till the soil in a scientific way. Under the work of Professor Hopkins it is intended to make a survey of the whole State, so we may know the different kinds of soils and what crops can be grown to the best advantage. The soil survey without a demonstration of what can be done is of little value. [Applause.]

[Mr. SHACKLEFORD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I think the Bureau of Soils is a humbug. I think the head of the Bureau of Soils knows a good deal more about running a campaign for increased appropriations than he does about soils or their uses. I am not willing to take the judgment of a man who devotes most of his time to having telegrams sent to Members of Congress to vote for increased appropriations instead of devoting all of his time to the duties for which he is paid by the Government. I think if the head of the Bureau of Soils would devote less of his time to campaigns for increased appropriations and more of his time to the study of his job he might some day or other learn something about the thing for which he is being paid, and his judgment might in the end be worth taking on a proposition as important as this.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, surely.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Does the gentleman tell the House that the head of the Bureau of Soils has caused these telegrams to be sent here?

Mr. MADDEN. I believe, without any question, that the telegrams sent by the people from the various States of the Union to Members of this House were sent at the instigation of the man in charge of the Bureau of Soils.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Does not the gentleman believe that he does that gentleman a grave injustice to assert he did that when he has not any personal knowledge of it?

Mr. MADDEN. I would not want to do anybody an injustice, but I am quite sure this is not the first time that he has done that sort of thing. I have ample evidence to be able to reach a conclusion that he has done it in former cases, and the fair assumption is that he has done it in this instance. So that if the gentleman paid by the Government for discovering the value of soils in the various sections of the country would devote himself to the duties for which he is paid, and about which he is supposed to know something that is of some use to the people of the country, he would be more valuable doing that than he would be doing what I am sure he has done and ought not to do.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, would it not be a good idea to increase this appropriation, so as to give him more to do in his particular line of soil culture, and then he would not have time to run the other campaign? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. On the contrary, I believe that, with such a man at the head of such a bureau, all the appropriations now standing to the credit of that bureau ought to be eliminated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will permit me to say this much in justice to Mr. Whitney. I want to say that he stated to me that he had never used any influence of that kind, directly or indirectly, to affect the view of any Member.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire in whose time the gentleman from Kentucky is speaking. I have not yielded him any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is speaking by unanimous consent.

Mr. SCOTT. I will now ask the gentleman from Alabama to use some of his time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How much time is left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has eight minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Kansas twelve minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB].

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, there is but one question before this House, and that is whether or not you will adopt this amendment adding $100,000 to the Bureau of Soils or whether you will stand by your committee, who had a fair opportunity and one of the best opportunities to ascertain what amount should be appropriated for this bureau. All this wide range that this question has taken is not germane to the discussion at all, and I do not propose to discuss the utility of the soil survey or its desirability. But I want to say this, that as a member of that committee and the oldest member in service on it, and this opinion is shared by many another Member of this House, that this Bureau of Soils should never have been created, that it should be a division in the Bureau of Plant Industry, because these soil surveys are of no service to anybody until there is a demonstration, and the Bureau of Plant Industry takes these soil surveys and makes experiments, and analyzes the different soils reported by the survey, and tells the farmers through bulletins what these soils will produce best. That map in front of the Speaker's desk shows whether or not your committee has been niggardly toward this Bureau of Soil Survey—we have given them an increase every year for ten years.

When I first became a member of the Agricultural Committee the Division of Soils, as it then was, received $16,000 in round numbers. This year the appropriation amounts to $237,000. These surveys are made faster than the Bureau of Plant Industry can demonstrate the possibility and practicability of the soils and to what those soils are adapted. Now, it is a wild speculation to attribute the prosperity that has come in this country to the farmers and others to the soil surveys. It is all chimerical; it is useless to talk in that sort of way. We have given the Soils Survey all the money they can use, and I ask this committee to stand by the report of the Committee on Agriculture. Every year we are troubled with this. Last year there was put on a great addition here, and the Senate cut it out, as it will do this time should the amendment prevail. We are wasting time talking about it. The question is whether we shall add the $100,000 or stand by the report of your committee, which I think knows what it is doing and is one of the most industrious committees in this House, if I do say so. [Applause.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. How much did this bureau demand of your committee in appropriations this year?

Mr. LAMB. They do not demand, but they estimate for $287,100, and we gave them the same sum as last year.

Mr. COX of Indiana. How much did they recommend the increase to be over what it was last year?

Mr. LAMB. Forty-nine thousand four hundred dollars.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Then I understand the Committee on Agriculture complied with their recommendation?

Mr. LAMB. We did not give them all they asked. Of course we are not going to give them all they asked; if we did, we would not have money for anything else.

Mr. COX of Indiana. How much did your committee increase it?

Mr. LAMB. We did not increase it. We gave them the same as last year. I now yield back the time to the gentleman from Kansas. I simply desired to discuss the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and show to the House that the report of our committee was reasonable and all that the Soils Survey should ask.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the value of the work that has been done by the Bureau of Soils surveys. I went into the committee this year with the express determination of offering an amendment to increase that appropriation in accordance with the estimates of the department. I believe that anything that will conserve the fertility of the soil ought to be encouraged, because we recognize it as the greatest natural resource that the Nation possesses to-day. Any contribution to that end should certainly be welcomed by Congress. But after I had listened to all the evidence on this proposition and ascertained the use that is being made of these soil surveys, the impracticability of the reports which were being made, the utter impossibility of the farmers applying it practically in their operations throughout the country, I concluded to vote with the committee, and believe that the present appropriation is sufficient.

They are engaged in good work. Let them proceed with this experimental work that they are now doing for years with the present appropriation. Then, if it becomes practical and can become of use to the American farmer, we can increase the appropriation. But during the experimental stages let us permit the appropriation to remain where it is. The sum is sufficient for experimental purposes.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. COLE. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a benefit to the farmers to have these soil surveys made, how does the gentleman account for the fact that there is a general clamor to have them made throughout the country?

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I have not observed any great clamor for these soil surveys. I think that the evidence on file will not sustain any such conclusion.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COLE. My time has expired.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended——

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I must object. We on this side have only one more speech, and I would like for the gentleman from Alabama to use that time, and I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON].

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, in the midst of so much difference of opinion as to the usefulness of soil surveys, I think it might be timely to cite cases that are certain. Sumter County, in the sixth district of Alabama, was surveyed some years ago. In the last three years we have undertaken to utilize the benefits of that survey, the result of which has opened up a large part of the soil of Sumter County to the culture of alfalfa and has shown the possibilities of other culture that have never been suspected before.

We have completed the survey of Marion County, in the sixth district of Alabama, and have discovered, where it was never dreamed before, that here also there are soils suited to the culture of alfalfa. We are now beginning that culture in this county. We believe that in the county of Tuscaloosa and the county of Pickens and the county of Hale that we have soils similar to the county of Perry, in the ninth district, where tobacco has been successfully grown as the result of a soil survey. We are now waiting for the survey of those counties to begin the introduction of this valuable culture.

Mr. COLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOBSON. I am sorry, but the four minutes I have are all needed to make a simple statement of fact.

Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal of confusion on this subject that ought not to exist. Many Members are confusing the soil survey with the utilization work that follows. I found the reports of the survey of Sumpter County piled up in the probate office. Nobody had ever used them. They had been there for some time and had done no good. I can see perfectly well that if no utilization work is undertaken after the survey is made the survey will not be of much use. I believe that utilization work should be pushed and rapidly developed. But, at the same time, you can not take up the best and most complete and most scientific work of utilization until after the soil survey has been made. Therefore the survey work should be pushed the more rapidly, so that utilization can go ahead. Confusion seems to exist as to the relation of the work of the bureaus in the Department of Agriculture, due no doubt to the former overlapping of the work of the Bureau of Soils and Bureau of Plant Industry. This overlapping has now been eliminated by a ruling of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The Bureau of Soils has now been confined strictly to the work in which it is expert. There can now be no question of misinformation, no question of doubt, as to the accuracy of the reports sent out by this bureau.

It is a mistake to assume, however, that restricting the duties has reduced the amount of work now falling to this bureau. On the contrary, the field of this work has been enormously extended by adding the whole semiarid zone. The country has been divided during this last year into great zones, one of which is called the "semiarid zone," extending from Texas to the Canadian frontier. This great section of the country is waiting on these surveys to utilize great possibilities known to exist there. In order to meet the demands from this zone it was decided to reduce the surveys in the South and in other parts of the country, which has worked a hardship there. Mr. Chairman, no section of the country ought to be made to wait. The survey is the first step needed, and no time should be lost in making surveys of all the farm lands of the Nation. Nor is it a matter for the States alone or the Nation alone, but for cooperation of both State and Nation. We should lose no time in putting agriculture on the most scientific basis and in finding out, as in my district, the extent of the soils available for all the great crops.

The best-informed and most farsighted men of the country are pointing to a day not far distant when America will be compelled to import foodstuffs. We can make no mistake in supplying ample funds for pushing forward the soil-survey work. As to the Chief of the Bureau of Soils, the chief complaint seems to be his enthusiasm for the cause. As far as my observation has been able to extend, he is one of the most conscientious, hard-working, competent public servants I have ever known; but even if he has been overzealous, that is no just ground for making the agricultural interests of the country suffer for lack of funds. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOBSON. I would like one minute more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have promised the balance of my time, I will say to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOBSON. Could the chairman of the committee give me one minute?

Mr. SCOTT. I am very sorry, but my time is all used.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, a criticism has been made of the experiments in tobacco culture which resulted from the soil surveys. The fact was reported to this House last year, and is uncontradicted so far as I know, that the internal-revenue increase as the result of these tobacco experiments in Alabama and in Texas brings into the Federal Treasury more than the Government has ever appropriated for all these surveys.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD] in his criticism, and a harsh criticism, of the Bureau of Soils admits that these surveys do enable the farmers in a large way to determine what fertilizers to use. The Secretary of Agriculture in his report says that the farmers of this country spend a hundred million dollars a year for fertilizers, and that a third of that sum, $33,000,000 a year, is wasted because of the misapplication of fertilizer elements to soil conditions and needs. If we are to save the farmers in this country $33,000,000 a year, or any fraction of that sum, it occurs to me to be inexcusable economy to refuse to appropriate $100,000 for the purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield a minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to state this: Five or six years ago I had these soil surveys made in my district in two of the largest counties. The farmers were greatly benefited and so told me. A commercial board in one county and others urged me last session, I think, and I brought the matter to the attention of the committee last session to ask for reprints of what had been done, so that all the farmers in the district might study what had been said by the scientists who went there and investigated this matter. The latter showed the people where it was best to plant their seed corn, wheat, potatoes, tobacco, berries, and so forth, and they have, to a great extent, done so and been greatly benefited. For instance, they said that out yonder on the side of a barren hill, among the little oak bushes and in similar soil, they could best produce berries and fruit. So the people down there, who were not using these barren hills, are now, as a result of this information, and they turned these hills into vineyards and formed associations for that purpose. I say that it has been a great benefit to those who have studied what these men have taught. [Applause.]

Mr. SHEPPARD. The soils of the United States constitute the greatest natural endowment of the American people, far exceeding in the value of their annual products the returns secured from all mines and fisheries. The Bureau of Soils is charged with the investigation of these soil resources and with determining the best methods for the development of agricultural industry upon all of the various soils which exist in the different portions of the country.

Soil surveys have been made of the tobacco soils of the United States covering the most important tobacco-producing districts in 16 different States. The results of these soil surveys show that among all of the agricultural crops the tobacco crop is probably more directly affected by the character of the soil upon which it is grown than any other. The heavy clay soils of Kentucky and Tennessee produce the thick export tobacco to the best advantage. The light sandy soils of the Connecticut Valley and of Florida produce the cigar-wrapper tobaccos. The sandy loam soils underlain by clay at a moderate depth produce the cigar-filler tobaccos in Florida, Alabama, and Texas, which are excelled only by the very best leaf produced in the most favored tobacco districts of Cuba. Through the work of the Bureau of Soils in outlining and indicating the existence of these different classes of soils, the area devoted to tobacco, particularly in the Gulf States, has been more than quadrupled in the last five years, and sections which ten years ago depended solely upon cotton as their money crop are now producing millions of pounds of tobacco upon soils which have been shown by the soil surveys to be peculiarly suited to the production of this crop and of far greater value for the production of tobacco than of any other crop which can be grown.

The investigations of the Bureau of Soils, through its soil surveys, have also shown the existence along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts of large areas of sandy loam soils peculiarly suited to the production of market-garden and winter truck crops, and as a result of soil surveys throughout the Southeastern and Southern States, land which was formerly held to be worthless for the production of staple crops, is now valued at $100 to $200 per acre for the production of winter truck and small fruits.

The Bureau of Soils has investigated the types of soils best suited to the production of a large number of different varieties of apples, not only throughout the Northeastern States, but also throughout the Appalachian region and the Ozark uplift of Missouri and Arkansas. These soil surveys have shown that different soil types are suited to single and peculiar varieties of apples which can be produced to the greatest perfection only upon a definite class of soil. The horticultural interests of several States have been vitally affected by the results of these soil surveys in New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Alabama, Arkansas, and Missouri.

The soil surveys in south Texas have shown that the soils of a vast region formerly given over to the grazing of cattle, and considered of only moderate value for the production of cultivated crops, are suited to the production of citrus fruits and highly valuable varieties of table grapes. The soil surveys in northern and northeastern Texas have also indicated the existence of hundreds of thousands of square miles of land especially well suited to the production of alfalfa and of other valuable forage crops. These lands constitute vast stretches of prairie which had formerly been given up to the sole production of the cotton crop. With this crop threatened by the advance of the Mexican cotton-boll weevil, it is absolutely essential that the farmers of north Texas should understand the capabilities of the soils for the production of alfalfa, corn, and sorghum. Extensive soil surveys should be made in order to demonstrate the existence of soils suited to these crops.

Along the Gulf coast of Texas, extending westward from the Louisiana rice fields, are extensive areas of prairie soils which a few scattered soil surveys have shown to be peculiarly well suited to the production of rice. Additional soil surveys should be made along the Gulf coast from the Sabine River westward to indicate the remaining areas of this prairie land which may be occupied by the rice crop. Throughout the same region the alluvial lands along the rivers constitute an additional area upon which sugar cane may be produced economically, and the extension of the home production of refined sugar necessitates the extension of soil surveys to show the extent and character of these soils.

One of the most important results of the soil-survey work throughout the cotton-growing States has been to demonstrate beyond question the fact that the annual cotton production of the Gulf States may be more than doubled without the use of a single additional acre of soil for growing the cotton crop. Soil surveys in Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, and a study of the adaptation of these different soils to the different varieties of cotton, have shown that the States of the cotton belt annually suffer millions of dollars of loss from the indiscriminate planting of unknown varieties of cotton upon types of soil to which such varieties are not at all suited. Experimental work at the different state stations have shown that the amount of lint produced by cotton which has been originated and bred upon a distinct type of soil is not infrequently reduced to less than one-half the yield when this variety of cotton is planted upon another soil. If the cotton planters of the Southern States can be shown, by the means of these soil surveys, what the capabilities of their cotton soils are, and can be told what varieties of cotton will produce the largest yields upon each of these soil types, there will be an annual profit to the cotton planters alone which will return to them $1,000,000 for each $1,000 expended in the prosecution of these soil surveys.

The agricultural lands of the Southern States are not like those of the great central prairie States densely occupied by an agricultural population. In the majority of the Gulf States less than one-third of the available agricultural land is under cultivation at the present time, and in the State of Texas less than one acre in ten which is available for the production of crops was occupied by the farming population at the time of the last census. Since that time the agricultural population of Texas has been increased by over 1,000,000 people, as nearly as can be estimated in the absence of later census figures, and citizens of other States are crowding into Texas at the rate of 30,000 to 40,000 persons per month, in search of homes and agricultural opportunities on Texas soils.

Requests for the soil survey of over 60 additional Texas counties have been presented to the Bureau of Soils, supported by the petitions of the Texas Farmers' Congress, representing over 300,000 Texas farmers, by local agricultural organizations, and by boards of trade. In order that the agricultural opportunities of Texas and the nature and the character of Texas lands may be made known, not only to the present population of the State but to those who are desiring to make their homes there, the extension of the soil-survey work in Texas is earnestly desired and as earnestly urged.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I want to say this, that the gentleman in charge of this bill and the gentlemen who have reported the bill to the House have uniformly, almost, condemned the Bureau of Soils, condemned the Soil Survey, and yet we find in this bill an appropriation already of $137,000 to carry out this work.

Now, if it is no good, if it is a fake, as you say it is, if it is a useless proposition, why are you wasting government money for it; why are you bringing in an appropriation of $137,000 if it is no good? It is good, and by your very action in reporting this appropriation you stand for the Bureau of Soils; you stand for soil surveys, or you condemn yourselves. If it is good, then why should we not carry on the work; why should we not make it $237,000 instead of $137,000 to finish the work?

Mr. RUCKER. Why should we limit it to $237,000?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think we should push it as rapidly as we can, and if we had the men to do the work to-day, and bring it to the people, I would say $400,000; but we have got the men to work for which we ask this sum.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Five hundred thousand dollars would not meet the expense to supply all the requests made for these surveys.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly. Here are people from one end of the country to the other demanding these soil surveys. Now, they want them, and the Committee on Agriculture approves the Bureau of Soils, because I will not say they condemn themselves. Therefore why should we hesitate to increase this appropriation the pitiful sum of $100,000, when you are spending millions that go to the benefit of no one, especially not to the benefit of the producing classes in this country? [Applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas has six minutes remaining.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, while the appropriation bill was pending before the Committee on Agriculture the following gentlemen appeared before that committee to ask for more liberal appropriations for some of the bureaus: Dr. W. H. Jordan, of Geneva, N. Y.; Dr. W. E. Stone, president of Purdue University, Indiana; Dr. H. C. White, of the University of Georgia; and Prof. C. F. Curtis, dean of the College of Agriculture, of Ames, Iowa. They did not volunteer any comment upon the Bureau of Soils, I think I ought to say in fairness to them; but they were asked whether they believed the work of that Bureau of Soils to be of practical value, and they united in the declaration that in their judgment the value of that work had been grossly exaggerated. Doctor Jordan expressed this opinion, in which they all declared they concurred:

> We recognize the fact that there is being done in the laboratories of the Bureau of Soils some excellent investigational work which we would not like to see cease, and which should be encouraged. But as to this broad general study by the Bureau of Soils of various sections of the country, I do not feel that in the State of New York we have gotten anything out of it. I am answering you frankly, without the slightest desire to reflect upon anybody.

Then Doctor White, of Georgia, said:

> You are asking me now my opinion and that of the gentlemen with whom I am associated, and the general farming people whom I know, as to the utility of the soil surveys in farm practice, and I tell you that in my judgment, and I believe in the judgment of others, the importance which has been given by the Bureau of Soils itself in its reports and elsewhere to the value of that work has been grossly exaggerated.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman will pardon me; I can not yield.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I should like to read some statements that the gentleman has not read.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman will understand, in view of the brief time I have, that I can not yield.

The extracts which I have read show clearly enough the opinion of men who have control of the state agricultural colleges, and certainly the views of trained and scientific agriculturists ought to be entitled to some weight.

The gentleman from Alabama very properly inquires why it is, if the committee believes these soil surveys to have no value, that we make any appropriation for them at all? We do believe they have value, but we believe the value depends on whether or not the surveys are followed up by utilization work; and the position we take is that with the appropriation we carry in this bill they will be able to make all the surveys which can possibly be so followed up. It is because we take this position that we make that appropriation. And to say that because $137,000 is good, $237,000 would be better, is just about as logical and worthy of about as much consideration as to say because one battle ship is good a hundred battle ships would be better, basing upon that argument a demand for an appropriation of a sufficient amount to build them.

But I take the position that if the claims of the Bureau of Soils were ten times as great as they are, I should still wish to see this amendment defeated because of the methods used to force it through this House. Of course I do not refer to the gentleman from Alabama or to any other Members of the House who are supporting this amendment. They have done nothing and are doing nothing not absolutely within their rights.

But it is well known that as long ago as last Friday, days before this paragraph in the bill had been reached, long before any public announcement had been made that this amendment would be offered, gentlemen on this floor began to receive telegrams from their constituents asking them to support "the Griggs amendment," the expectation at that time doubtless being that it would be offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

Now, those of us who have served even a single session here know perfectly well that such telegrams as these are inspired. They are not spontaneous. In the very nature of things, those who sent them could not have known that such an amendment as this was to be offered unless they had been informed, directly or indirectly, by some one who was on the inside here in Washington. Now, I know the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has not sent out this information, and I do not believe it has been done by any other Member. Then, who did send it out? Who is likely to have sent it except some one who had a personal interest in swelling the appropriations for this bureau? [Applause.]

No one could be more reluctant than I to make a damaging charge against any man without absolute proof to sustain it. But it is so obvious that these telegrams were inspired, and it is so obvious that the men connected with the Bureau of Soils have a greater interest than anyone else has in the passage of this amendment that I can not believe I am wrong in charging that someone connected with that bureau is responsible for this outrage. For is it not an outrage? Can there be conceived a more intolerable situation than would exist if bureau officials generally, whenever they failed to get all the money they asked for from a committee, should go over the head of that committee, over the head of their department chief, and by "building a fire" under Members of the House, by the meanest and most disreputable of the tricks of the lobbyist, should attempt to coerce Congress into swelling their appropriations?

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. I shall be obliged to decline. If this were the first time the Bureau of Soils had offended in this way, I should not feel so strongly about it. But gentlemen may remember that we had a precisely similar experience with this same bureau last year. At that time the officials of that bureau, in utter contempt of your Committee on Agriculture, in insolent disregard of the wishes of the Secretary of the department, demanded from this House a hundred per cent increase in their appropriation and enforced that demand through a species of lobbying, bolder and more unscrupulous than any I have ever known. The House yielded to that demand, and to-day we see the result. Emboldened by their success last year the officials of this bureau are attempting another raid upon the Treasury through the same tactics. Will they win again? I can not believe it. I can not believe that this House will deliberately give notice that all any bureau chief has to do who is disappointed with the appropriation given him by a committee in order to get all the money he wants is merely to build a hot enough fire under the Members at home. I can not believe that this House will vote to discredit its own committee and declare in effect that its recommendations are entitled to no weight as against the demands of a bureau chief. I appeal to the House to vote down this amendment and thus serve notice that the Congress reserves to itself the right to fix the limit of appropriations and that lobbying on the part of bureau officials is insufferable and must cease. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. UNDERWOOD) there were—ayes 60, noes 90.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total for Bureau of Soils, $232,660.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER of Vermont, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 27053, the agricultural appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

Mr. MANN. What is this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. An Indian bill, for the alienating of certain lands of the Quapaw Nation.

appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be printed and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 6th instant, proposing to appropriate $140,000 for establishing aids to navigation in Alaskan waters, etc., intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon and moved that it be printed and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3423) to pay the balance due the loyal Creek Indians on the award made them by the Senate on the 16th day of February, 1903, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 975) thereon.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 8554) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell part or all of the surplus lands of members of the Kaw or Kansas tribe of Indians in Oklahoma, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 976) thereon.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 9295) in relation to the salary of the Secretary of State, reported it with an amendment.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. SCOTT. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6392) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish two condemned brass cannon and cannon balls to the county court of Mercer County, W. Va., to report it favorably with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 965) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment was, after the word "authorized," in line 3, to insert:

And directed to donate to the county court of Mercer County, W. Va., two condemned bronze fieldpieces, with their carriages, which may be available and may not be needed in the service, the same to be used in the park surrounding the court-house, in the town of Princeton, W. So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to donate, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Secretary of War to donate two condemned cannon to the county court of Mercer County, W. Va."

WYATT O. SELKIRK.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I report back favorably, without amendment, from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (H. R. 18726) for the relief of Wyatt O. Selkirk, and I submit a report (No. 963) thereon. I invite the attention of the senior Senator from Texas to the bill.

Wildrick on the lineal list of officers of the Coast Artillery Corps, and that thereafter the name of Lieutenant Selkirk shall be borne in that relative position on the records of the War Department and on the Army Register.

Mr. KEAN. What is the object of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. It is to correct an error. It is being done on the recommendation of the Chief of Staff.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROWN. I move that the bill (S. 8356) to enable the Omaha Indians to protect from overflow their tribal and allotted lands located within the boundaries of any drainage district in Nebraska, and the bill (S. 9039) to enable the Winnebago Indians to protect from overflow their tribal and allotted lands located within the boundaries of any drainage district in Nebraska, be recalled from the House.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDUSTRIAL PEACE COMMITTEE.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. From the Committee on the Judiciary, I report back the bill (H. R. 19662) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the Foundation for the Promotion of Industrial Peace." The Committee on Education and Labor has had under consideration a bill identical in form and substance, and I move that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from its further consideration, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. I call the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] to the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. Can not the motion be divided, and the question first put on discharging the committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the question will first be put as to whether the Committee on the Judiciary shall be discharged from the further consideration of the bill. The question is on agreeing to the motion to discharge the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, this bill is identical with a bill which has been recommended by the Committee on Education and Labor, and is now on the calendar. It is simply to amend the act to establish the Foundation for the Promotion of Industrial Peace in the matter of organization, as recommended by Secretary Straus. There can be no possible objection to it. It merely changes the membership by adding the trustees provided in the original act. A similar Senate bill has been before the Committee on Education and Labor and is recommended by it for passage. I ask that the bill now before the Senate be passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I am very desirous of getting an important appropriation bill through to-day. I must object to the consideration of anything that will give rise to debate.

Mr. DANIEL. There is no possible chance for debate. Secretary Straus thus sums up the amendments, which are by the bill made to the act that was passed some two years ago:

> The amendment provides that the "Industrial Peace Committee" shall consist of 16 members instead of 9, as now provided, and shall include the 7 trustees created by the act.
>
> * * * * * * *
> I have also drafted an amendment to section 3, which does away with the necessity of calling an annual conference with the representatives of capital and labor for the purpose of discussing industrial problems.

These are the only changes in the act to establish the Foundation for the Promotion of Industrial Peace, under which the President awarded the Nobel prize. The substantial parts of the measure are already the law of the land.

Mr. HALE. What committee reports the bill?

Mr. DANIEL. It was reported from the Committee on Education and Labor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. HALE. My attention has been called to the fact that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] is not here, who objected the other day to the consideration of the bill, and I think I must object, in order that he may have an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator from Rhode Island objected under a misconception. The proposed law merely makes two changes in the organization.

Mr. HALE. I have stated the reason. The Senator from Rhode Island who objected to the bill is not here.

Mr. DANIEL. He objected under a misapprehension of the bill.

Mr. HALE. I know the Senator was very strong in his objection. It had better lie over until he is here.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming, that the bill be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. DANIEL. The bill has already been recommended by that committee. I ask that it be placed on the calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor?

The motion was agreed to.

THE SECRET SERVICE.

Mr. HEMENWAY. From the Committee on Appropriations I present a report, and I ask that the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report (No. 970), as follows:

> The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred Senate resolution 233, given below, submit the following preliminary report:
>
> "Resolved, That that portion of the annual message of the President relating to the Secret Service is hereby referred to the Committee on Appropriations, who are instructed to inquire whether the legislation referred to in the message has impaired the efficiency or sufficiency of the force employed in the Secret Service; and such committee are further directed to ascertain what persons other than those included in the Secret Service were paid from the Public Treasury during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1908, for services in connection with the enforcement of the laws or for work in the detection or investigation of possible crimes or criminal acts or violations of law, including all special attorneys, special agents, inspectors, or other employees of any department of the Government or any branch of the public service, and also same information as to all persons whose employment was authorized by indefinite or general appropriations; the information to contain the names of all persons so employed or paid, their previous occupation, the nature of the work in which they were engaged, by whom they were appointed, and upon whose suggestion or recommendation; the inquiry, however, not to include officers appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, or officers specifically provided for by law, or laborers appointed as such and actually engaged in employment as laborers.
> "For the purpose of carrying out the instructions of the Senate, the Committee on Appropriations are hereby authorized, by subcommittee or otherwise, to sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate, to send for persons and papers, to subpœna witnesses, to administer oaths, to examine witnesses under oath, and to employ such clerical and other assistance as shall enable the committee to report fully and promptly upon the matters contained in this inquiry, the expenses of the investigation to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the acting chairman of the Committee on Appropriations; and said committee are further directed to report as soon as practicable, from time to time, the results of their inquiry, and to make such recommendations as they may see fit with reference thereto, and further to report what action, if any, in the judgment of the committee, the Senate should take with reference to that portion of the message."

This resolution (S. 233) was adopted by the Senate on December 16, 1908, and it authorizes the Committee on Appropriations to make inquiry into certain legislation referred to by the President in his message to Congress. That portion of the President's message which gave rise to the adoption of this resolution reads as follows:

> "SECRET SERVICE.
> "Last year an amendment was incorporated in the measure providing for the Secret Service, which provided that there should be no detail from the Secret Service and no transfer therefrom. It is not too much to say that this amendment has been of benefit only, and could be of benefit only, to the criminal classes. If deliberately introduced for the purpose of diminishing the effectiveness of war against crime it could not have been better devised to this end. It forbade the practices that had been followed to a greater or less extent by the executive heads of various departments for twenty years. To these practices we owe the securing of the evidence which enabled us to drive great lotteries out of business and secure a quarter of a million dollars in fines from their promoters. These practices have enabled us to discover some of the most outrageous frauds in connection with the theft of government land and government timber by great corporations and by individuals. These practices have enabled us to get some of the evidence indispensable in order to secure the conviction of the wealthiest and most formidable criminals with whom the Government has to deal, both those operating in violation of the antitrust law and others.
> "The amendment in question was of benefit to no one excepting to these criminals, and it seriously hampers the Government in the detection of crime and the securing of justice. Moreover, it not only affects departments outside of the Treasury, but it tends to hamper the Secretary of the Treasury himself in the effort to utilize the employees of his department so as to best meet the requirements of the public service. It forbids him from preventing frauds upon the customs service, from investigating irregularities in branch mints and assay offices, and has seriously crippled him. It prevents the promotion of employees in the Secret Service, and this further discourages good effort. In its present form the restriction operates only to the advantage of the criminal, of the wrongdoer. The chief argument in favor of the provision was that the Congressmen did not themselves wish to be investigated by secret-service men. Very little of such investigation has been done in the past; but it is true that the work of the secret-service agents was partly responsible for the indictment and conviction of a Senator and a Congressman for land frauds in Oregon. I do not believe that it is in the public interest to protect criminals in any branch of the public service, and exactly as we have again and again during the past seven years prosecuted and convicted such criminals who were in the executive branch of the Government, so in my belief we should be given ample means to prosecute them if found in the legislative branch. But if this is not considered desirable a special exception could be made in the law prohibiting the use of the secret-service force in investigating Members of the Congress. It would be far better to do this than to do what actually was done, and strive to prevent, or at least to hamper, effective action against criminals by the executive branch of the Government."

The amendment referred to by the President in his message is an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and the amendment reads as follows:

> "No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used in the payment of compensation or expense of any person detailed or transferred from the Secret Service of the Treasury Department or (and) who may at any time during the fiscal year 1909 have been employed by or under said Secret Service Division."

Your committee has taken occasion to make some investigation into the origin and purpose of legislation creating the secret-service force in the Treasury Department and find that in 1857 the following joint resolution was adopted:

> "Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to cause inquiry to be made by two competent commissioners into processes and means claimed to have been discovered by J. T. Barclay for preventing the abrasion, counterfeiting, and deterioration of the coins of the United States, and to report the results of the said inquiry to Congress at its next session, with his opinion as to the probable value of the alleged discoveries; and the sum of $2,500, out of any money of the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, is hereby appropriated for that purpose." (Approved Feb. 26, 1857.) (Stat. L., vol. 2, p. 254.)

In 1860 an appropriation of $5,000 was made by Congress to be expended under the above resolution. (Stat. L., vol. 12, p. 83.) The following appropriations were subsequently made:

Fiscal year 1861, "For the detection and bringing to trial persons engaged in counterfeiting the coin of the United States, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, $10,000." (Stat. L., vol. 12, p. 102.)

Fiscal year 1865, "For the purpose of meeting any expenses in detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, or other securities of the United States, as well as the coin of the United States; * * * $100,000." (Stat. L., vol. 13, p. 351.)

Fiscal year 1866, same purposes, $50,000. (Stat. L., vol. 14, p. 22.)

Fiscal year 1867, same purposes, $150,000. (Stat. L., vol. 14, p. 310.)

Fiscal year 1868, same purposes, $150,000. (Stat. L., vol. 14, p. 455.)

Fiscal year 1868, deficiency, "For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, as well as the coin of the United States, and other frauds on the revenue, $25,000." (Stat. L., vol. 15, p. 173.)

In appropriating for fiscal year 1869, Congress varied the language contained in the above provision in the deficiency bill and used the following language:

> "For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, and other securities, as well as the coins of the United States, and other frauds upon the Government, $150,000." (Stat. L., vol. 15, p. 111.)

This language was adhered to by subsequent Congresses until 1872, when the following provision was enacted:

> "For detecting and bringing to trial persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, national-bank notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, as well as the coins of the United States, and other frauds upon the Government, $125,000." (Stat. L., vol. 16., p. 497.)

For fiscal year 1873 the same amount was appropriated as was appropriated in the previous year, but the words "national-bank notes" and the words "as well as the coins of the United States" were omitted.

The language of the statute of 1874 for the same purpose is as follows:

"For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, national-bank notes, and other securities of the United States and the coinage thereof, and for detecting other frauds upon the Government, $125,000." (Stat. L., vol. 17, p. 512.

The language of the statute of 1875 is as follows:

"For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, national-bank notes, and other securities of the United States and the coinage thereof, and for detecting other frauds upon the Government, to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, $125,000." (Stat. L., vol. 18, p. 206.)

Fiscal year 1876, same purposes, $125,000. (Stat. L., vol. 18, p. 375.)
Fiscal year 1878, same purposes, $100,000. (Stat. L., vol. 19, p. 354.)

The language of the statute of 1879 is as follows:

"For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, national-bank notes, and other securities of the United States, as well as coins of the United States, and other frauds on the Government, $100,000." (Stat. L., vol. 20, p. 217.)

The language of the statute for 1880 is as follows:

"For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment of persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, national-bank notes, and other securities of the United States, as well as the coins of the United States, and other crimes against the Government, and for no other purpose whatever, $60,000." (Stat. L., vol. 20, p. 384.)

The language of the statute for 1881 is as follows:

"For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, national-bank notes, and other securities of the United States, as well as the coins of the United States, and robbing mails, and other felonies, committed against the United States relating to postal service, the pay and bounty laws, and against the laws relating to the revenue service, and for no other purposes whatever, $80,000." (Stat. L., vol. 21, p. 265.)

The language of the statute for 1882 is as follows:

"For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, national-bank notes, and other securities of the United States, as well as the coins of the United States, and other felonies committed against the law of the United States relating to the pay and bounty laws, and for no other purpose whatever. $80,000." (Stat. L., vol. 21, p. 441.)

Fiscal year 1883, same purposes, $67,000. (Stat. L., vol. 22, p. 313.)

In addition to the foregoing lump sum for 1883, specific appropriations were made for salaries of the chief and for other employees in the "Secret Service Division" in the Treasury Department amounting to $12,980. (Stat. L., vol. 22, p. 230.)

The latter appropriation, and similar ones for every year since, was made because of the act of 1882 (Stat. L., vol. 22, p. 255), requiring specific appropriations to be made for salaries of all persons employed in the executive departments at Washington.

Fiscal year 1885, same purposes, $60,000. (Stat. L., vol. 23, p. 206.)
Fiscal year 1886, same purposes, $60,000. (Stat. L., vol. 23, p. 495.)
Fiscal year 1887, same purposes, $60,000. (Stat. L., vol. 24, p. 237.)
Fiscal year 1888, same purposes, $60,000. (Stat. L., vol. 24, p. 524.)

Fiscal year 1889, same purposes, $64,000, including $4,000 to make the necessary investigation of claims for reimbursement of expenses incident to last sickness and burial of deceased pensioners under section 4718 of the Revised Statutes. (Stat. L., vol. 25, p. 524.)

Fiscal year 1890, same purposes, $64,000. (Stat. L., vol. 25, p. 956.)

Fiscal year 1891, same purposes, $69,000, including $5,000 for the necessary investigation of violations of section 5209 (national-bank embezzlement) of the Revised Statutes. (Stat. L., vol. 26, p. 386.)

Fiscal year 1892, same purposes, $75,000. (Stat. L., vol. 26, p. 968.)

Fiscal year 1893, "For detecting, arresting, and delivering into the custody of the United States marshal having jurisdiction dealers and pretended dealers in counterfeit money, and persons engaged in counterfeiting Treasury notes, bonds, national-bank notes, and other securities of the United States and of foreign governments as well as the coins of the United States and of foreign governments, etc., $70,000." (Stat. L., vol. 27, p. 365.)

Fiscal year 1894, "For expenses incurred under the authority or with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury in detecting, etc.: Provided, That no part of this amount be used in defraying the expenses of any person subpœnaed by the United States courts to attend any trial before a United States court or preliminary examination before any United States commissioner, $60,000." (Stat. L., vol. 27, p. 589.)

Fiscal year 1895, same purposes, except inquiry as to violations of section 5209, Revised Statutes, embezzlement from national banks, omitted and not included thereafter, $60,000. (Stat. L., vol. 28, p. 390.)

Fiscal year 1896 and fiscal year 1897, same purposes, $65,000 each year. (Stat. L., vol. 28, p. 931; vol. 29, p. 430.)

Fiscal year 1898, same purposes, $75,000. (Stat. L., vol. 30, p. 28.)

Fiscal years 1899, 1900, 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905, 1906: Law remained the same for each of these years.

In 1907 Congress enlarged the work of the Secret Service Division by adding the following provision: "Except in the protection of the person of the President of the United States." Otherwise the law remained unchanged.

No further change was made in relation to the authority of the Secret Service until the amendment in the sundry civil act making appropriations for the year 1909, which is as follows:

"No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used in the payment of compensation or expense of any person detailed or transferred from the Secret Service of the Treasury Department or (and) who may at any time during the fiscal year 1909 have been employed by or under said Secret Service Division."

It would appear from reference to the various statutes relating to the secret-service work of the Treasury Department that Congress has from time to time temporarily broadened or limited the scope of this work, following in most instances the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that it has been the intention of Congress since 1857 to limit the operation of the employees paid from this fund to investigations of counterfeiting and similar frauds incident thereto.

CUSTOM OF DETAILING OR LOANING SECRET-SERVICE AGENTS TO DEPARTMENTS.

From the testimony of the heads of various departments furnished the committees of Congress in relation to this matter, it would seem that previous to the current fiscal year a custom had grown up whereby the secret-service employees of the Treasury Department were, upon the demand of any department, loaned or detailed to such department, and paid from the funds of the department to which they were detailed or loaned, and after the particular work to which they had been assigned was finished, they were again returned to the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department, in the meanwhile remaining on the rolls of the Secret Service Division and reporting to the chief of that division.

The effect of the amendment in the sundry civil bill for the current year is that if such transfers or details are made for the use of other departments or divisions such employees detailed can not be paid from any money appropriated by the sundry civil act. This amendment of itself does not prohibit any department or division from using such employees, provided they are paid from the appropriations other than those contained in the sundry civil act. However, it does not appear to your committee that it has ever been the intention of any Congress to build up a secret-service force under one particular head to make all classes of investigations other than those enumerated in the statute against counterfeiting, etc., and have such secret-service force working for one department, yet under the control of and reporting to a chief in another department. In the land-frauds investigation it appears that agents were detailed from the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department to the Department of Justice and there assigned to land-fraud cases. Thus there was the situation of agents of one department loaned to another to investigate violations of laws under the administration of still another department and reporting back to the Secret Service Division, which had nothing to do with the administration of the laws violated or with the prosecution of the violators. As to whether a system of this character would or would not be desirable is another question, but such an arrangement does not appear to have ever been the intention of any Congress.

Your committee are of the opinion that Congress should make ample provision for the apprehension and conviction of all violators of the federal laws, and it is our opinion, as shown by the facts, that never before in the history of the Government has Congress so amply provided for the detection and prosecution of violations of the laws.

LAND-FRAUD INVESTIGATIONS BY THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Your committee has made inquiry into the work of the Interior Department, which has jurisdiction over the public lands and the execution of the land laws and land frauds, about which much has been said, and while this investigation of necessity has not been as thorough as it must be in order to comply with all the requirements of the resolution (S. 233), we have been able to arrive at some conclusions as to whether or not Congress has in any manner hampered the investigation and apprehension of crimes under the jurisdiction of the Interior and other departments, and also as to whether the amendment to the sundry civil bill has worked as a hindrance to justice in these matters.

It appears by the testimony of the Secretary of the Interior, given below, that but one agent from the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department was ever detailed to the Interior Department to work on land-fraud cases:

"The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, Mr. Secretary—and if I am not correct in my statement you can correct me—the Interior Department has never had but one man detailed from the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department for the investigation of land frauds, and that man's name was Burns.

"Secretary GARFIELD. So far as the records show, I do not know of any other one." (Hearings on sundry civil bill, January 29, 1909, H. R.)

It further appears from testimony of Secretary Garfield that when he became Secretary of the Interior the matter of administering the land laws and investigating frauds was in a very chaotic and unsatisfactory condition. It appeared that the system of having secret-service employees from another department working on land matters under the control of some other chief frequently resulted in conflict and friction. The Department of Justice, being the department in which prosecutions were conducted, had detailed to investigation of land frauds secret-service employees who were evidently working at cross-purposes with the agents of the Interior Department. It does not appear who the secret-service men were, but the testimony indicates that they were detailed to the Department of Justice from the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department. To meet and remedy this condition it appears that the Secretary of the Interior and the Attorney-General entered into an arrangement whereby agents of the Interior Department were to have sole charge of land-fraud matters until the cases were worked up and ready for prosecution, at which time they would be turned over to the Department of Justice. In reference to this arrangement it is proper to note the following statement by Secretary Garfield:

"The CHAIRMAN. The conditions prior to the making of this arrangement in the matter of investigating land frauds were not satisfactory?

"Secretary GARFIELD. The conditions were not satisfactory. There was a force under the Department of Justice that was doing work of which the Land Office had no information, and I found that they were engaged upon cases upon which our own men were engaged, and there was overlapping of work, conflict, and friction between the two bodies of men; and it was only after months of inquiry that the Attorney-General and I were able to get a clear and definite statement of exactly what cases were being worked up, whether they were old cases, or whether they were instituting new cases; and as soon as we got that informaton we did away with the independent force under the Department of Justice initiating new cases." (P. 461, sundry civil hearings, Jan. 29, 1909, H. R.)

All the evidence goes to show that the Secretary of the Interior and the Attorney-General entered into this arrangement not because of any limitation by Congress as to the use of secret-service agents, but because the previous arrangement was unsatisfactory.

The Secretary of the Interior testified (p. 462, sundry civil hearings, Jan., 1909, H. R.) that he had not used secret-service men during the fiscal year 1908 and that he did not contemplate their future use.

In fact, evidence from other sources has been brought to the attention of your committee indicating that agents of the Secret-Service Division of the Treasury Department were not considered desirable for investigation of land-fraud cases, because of their lack of knowledge of the land laws and lack of knowledge of the character of evidence that would be admissible in courts and sufficient to sustain a cause of action. Your committee, however, has not had sufficient opportunity to verify these allegations, but they appear to be founded on facts.

CONGRESS HAS COOPERATED WITH INTERIOR DEPARTMENT FOR BETTER ADMINISTRATION OF LAW.

The multiplicity of land-fraud matters, and the laxity in the enforcement of these laws and in the apprehension of criminals, can in no wise be charged to Congress, for in only one instance in nine years has Congress failed to appropriate the amount asked for by the Interior Department, and in some instances has exceeded the estimate, and for the last five years Congress has at no time appropriated less than the amount asked for for this purpose. For the fiscal year 1908 Congress appropriated for this branch of the service in the Interior Department $250,000. For the fiscal year 1909, the year that the sundry civil amendment referred to in the President's message was in effect, Congress doubled the appropriation for the investigating branch of the Interior Department and gave them $500,000. In this connection it is proper to note the following statement made by the Secretary of the Interior before the Appropriation Committee of the House of Representatives on sundry civil hearings this session of Congress:

"The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, Mr. Secretary, there is nothing in the record to show that it could be attributed in any way to the failure on the part of Congress to provide all the money that it was estimated to be necessary for the service.

"Secretary GARFIELD. You are quite right. There has never been any criticism by me made of the action of Congress in giving the department the appropriations that have been asked for this purpose, and I simply attribute the conditions we find now to the fact that there was not the present keenness for careful administration and careful investigation and examination of the work itself and the methods of conducting that work. (P. 471, sundry civil hearings, Jan. 29, 1909, H. R.)

"Secretary GARFIELD. * * * Our own officers have been negligent in not using good common sense in acting upon the cases that have come before them. The basis of the land system is the work of the register and receiver. If you have not men that are straight, with knowledge of their districts, and with legal ability on the part of the register and of ordinary business sense on the part of the receiver, then we are going to have things radically wrong. I think that much of the difficulty in land administration has been due to the failure to get the right sort of men as registers and receivers, and we have made a very great effort, and have had the hearty cooperation of the Members of the House and Senate in getting a better class of men for these positions, so that now we have very much less difficulty of that kind than we had before. Further, the inspection service that has gone into these offices during the last year has caused a number of recommendations resulting in changes of registers and receivers because they were men not fitted to carry on the work in the way that it ought to be carried on." (P. 482, sundry civil hearings, Jan. 30, 1909, H. R.)

In view of the testimony of the Secretary of the Interior, and in view of the increased appropriation given the Interior Department for the investigation of frauds, your committee are of the opinion that the amendment to the sundry civil bill referred to in the President's message has in no wise hampered the work of the Interior Department in relation to land-fraud matters, as but one agent of the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department has ever been detailed to that department—none were used last year—and the Secretary of the Interior said that he had not contemplated using any in the future, and that owing to the fact that Congress doubled the appropriation for the purpose of investigating frauds under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department, and that the Department of Justice and the Interior Department have entered into an arrangement to handle these matters without conflicting, there has been more work done along the lines of proper administration of the law up to date of the current fiscal year than was ever done before in the same period of time in the history of the Government.

SECRET-SERVICE FORCE HAS BEEN ENTIRELY OCCUPIED IN COUNTERFEITING INVESTIGATIONS AND IN PROTECTING THE PRESIDENT.

Another matter which is relevant in considering this question is what assistance, if any, could have been rendered the various departments by the secret-service employees of the Treasury Department up to date during the current fiscal year in investigation of crimes had no limitation been placed upon their transfer or detail. In this connection it is proper to note the following statement by the Chief of the Secret Service Division:

"The CHAIRMAN. On what basis do you estimate $135,000 for the next fiscal year, which is $10,000 in excess of any amount every appropriated for this service?

"Mr. WILKIE. I estimate that because our expenses for the first half of this year have been practically half of that amount; and if we are to get through, and the business keeps up as it is, we will have to have that amount of money or hang up or discontinue the service altogether for thirty to forty-five days when we get to the end of the fiscal year. When we were confronted by this condition and found counterfeiters active all over the country, I went to the Secretary and said to him, 'We have got to spend more than we would spend if we made a monthly allotment and were held rigidly in it.' It is, of course, quite difficult in our service to say what we will have to spend in a particular month. There might come an emergency where we would have to spend $30,000 in a month. I told the Secretary how things were, and that we would either have to get after them or let them go, and he told me to go ahead." (P. 212, sundry civil hearings, H. R., Feb., 1909.)

A reference to the previous appropriations for the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department will show that in previous years when there were no limitations upon the detail or transfer of these agents, that in several instances money appropriated for this division was turned back into the Treasury unused, as was the case in 1907 and 1908. But during the current fiscal year, with the Secret Service Division limited to work in suppressing counterfeiting and protecting the person of the President, they have all the work they can do, and an increase of $20,000 is asked for this division for the next fiscal year. It would appear from this that this division has all it can do in performing the duties for which it was originally intended. The force, however, has been reduced from 65 men to 56 men, thereby cutting off the service of 9 men. But according to the testimony of the Chief of the Secret Service Division, these men are now employed in the Department of Justice, where the Government still has the advantage of their experience and training in this work.

FORMER METHOD OF DETAILING SECRET-SERVICE EMPLOYEES TO THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NOT CONSIDERED DESIRABLE BY THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

Had Congress placed no limitation upon the use of secret-service employees from the Treasury Department and had given an increased appropriation, additional men could no doubt have been employed by this division and perhaps some could have been detailed to other departments. As to the desirability of this plan it is interesting to note the following statement made by the Attorney-General:

"The CHAIRMAN. The next item is, 'Detection and prosecution of crimes.'

"Mr. BONAPARTE. There, Mr. Chairman, is rather an important matter to be considered. This would be the place, if it is thought proper, to insert language which would allow us to organize a permanent force of our own, so as to get rid of the employment of secret-service men, of bank examiners, and of other persons loaned to us—not loaned in the sense of being loaned gratuitously, but hired to us by other departments. That would be the proper place in which to put in an increase of appropriation for that purpose. It would decrease the miscellaneous expenses of the United States courts, and would probably come in this place under the provision for the detection of crime. I have already stated my views pretty fully to the committee on that point." (Sundry civil hearings, p. 773, H. R., Apr. 2, 1908.)

It will be seen that the system in vogue previous to the current fiscal year was not considered a desirable one either by the Attorney-General or by the Secretary of the Interior. In fact, the Chief of the Secret Service Division himself admits, as is shown by the following statement, that the proper place for a secret-service force for general work is under the Department of Justice:

"Mr. WILKIE. * * * I grant you that the ideal situation would be to have under the direction of the Attorney-General in the Department of Justice a well-trained force that could be used for the purpose of gathering evidence in all these cases. That is where investigating forces really belong, in my opinion. They should be in the Department of Justice. The cases have to go there eventually. All our cases go to the department of prosecution." (Sundry civil hearings, p. 236, H. R., Jan., 1909.)

Congress has made an appropriation for the employment of secret-service agents by the Department of Justice, and that department has at present such a force organized; and it is the opinion of your committee, that with the exception of a small force in the Treasury Department for use in investigating counterfeiting and protecting the person of the President of the United States, the Department of Justice is the proper place for the employment of secret-service agents, as it is the department to which finally all violations of the law must be reported and which must conduct the prosecutions and trials. There is appended to and made a part of this report (marked "appendix") a list of appropriations for the fiscal years 1908 and 1909, from which the attitude of Congress may be determined.

If the amendment to the sundry civil bill for the current year 1909 has operated as a restriction upon the use of the employees of the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department, such restriction is so technical and limited in character that it does not appear sufficient to warrant the impugning of the motives of Congress in adopting the amendment. No Congress in the history of the Government has so liberally supported the executive branch of the Government by appropriations to aid in the execution of law as has the Sixtieth Congress. The scope of the work of the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department might be enlarged so as to enable them to investigate violations of law under the jurisdiction of that department, but to give them authority to conduct all governmental investigations would, in the opinion of your committee, be very unwise and result in much conflict and friction between the various departments.

It has never been the intention of any Congress to build up a spy system of that character. The Department of Justice, to which ultimately all prosecutions for violations of law must be referred, should have secret-service agents to enable that department to properly conduct such prosecutions. It has not appeared to your committee that there are any violations of federal laws that the Department of Justice has not the authority to investigate, including lotteries, trusts, customs frauds, and all others, except, perhaps, counterfeiting. That department now has a secret-service force of its own which will no doubt be increased as future needs demand it.

The resolution (S. 233) under which this committee is operating is very comprehensive, and it will take considerable time to collect the information to comply with its requirements. There appears to be a considerable field for useful investigation along the lines suggested in the resolution. There has come to the attention of your committee alleged cases of misuse and improper official conduct of secret-service employees, but your committee has not had the time nor opportunity to verify these, as well as many other reports conveying alleged information relating to the subjects contemplated by the resolution. It is the opinion of your committee that this investigation should continue until all the facts in reference to specific charges can be thoroughly investigated and until all other information called for by the resolution can be collected and embraced in a report to the Senate with the recommendation of the committee as to future legislation affecting these matters.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. President, I ask that the table showing the appropriations, and appearing as an appendix to the report, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to make a few remarks on this report.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to make a few remarks myself.

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well; I will speak when the Senator concludes.

Mr. MONEY. I did not hear the request of the Senator from Indiana. I shall be glad to hear what it is.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The request was that the appendix to the report, showing the statement of appropriations for the fiscal years 1908 and 1909, be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MONEY. Has the reading of the report itself been finished?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The reading of the report has been concluded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary has completed the reading of the report. The Senator from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. President, there is one thing in connection with the report that I think ought to be made clear to the members of the Senate as well as to the public. There seems to have been a misapprehension growing out of the language used in the President's message, which has led many people to believe that the whole inspection force of the Government was hampered in some way by the restriction placed on the sundry civil bill. There were only 65 men employed under the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department when this restriction was placed on the bill. The total appropriation for that service for the fiscal year 1908 was $125,000. At the close of the fiscal year only $106,000 of that money had been used, and $19,000 was turned back into the Treasury. So the limitation that was placed in the sundry civil bill only affected the 65 men who were employed in the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department. Now there are 56 men employed in that service, and this restriction only applies to the 56 men.

But what is the restriction? Commencing away back in 1857, this division was built up for the detection of counterfeiting and bringing to justice men who counterfeited the moneys, bonds, and securities of the United States and of foreign countries. From year to year the appropriation for this purpose has been continued, averaging possibly $75,000 a year, and in 1907 we added to this appropriation the authority to protect the person of the President. So the 56 men now in the Secret Service of the Treasury Department have as their duty the suppression of counterfeiting, numerous smaller duties, and the protection of the person of the President.

What effect has the limitation had upon that particular force? The chief of the secret-service force, Mr. Wilkie, in appearing before the committee the other day and asking for appropriations for the coming fiscal year, stated that this force had been employed all of its time during the present fiscal year in suppressing counterfeiting and in protecting the person of the President; that the appropriation that they had for this fiscal year was not sufficient and that it would have to be increased to $135,000, being $20,000 more than they used for the fiscal year 1908.

It ought to be fully understood by the people that all the discussion about this restriction upon the use of the secret-service force of the Government only applied to 65 men at the time it was made, and now applies to but 56 men.

There is suggested the further question, Did the Congress of the United States hamper the President, the Interior Department, or the Department of Justice in following up land-fraud cases by putting on that restriction? Let us see. It has been shown by this report that every minute of the time of the 56 men who belong to the secret-service force of the Treasury Department is necessary to suppress counterfeiting and protect the person of the President. So, then, if the restriction had not been put on the sundry civil bill not one of these men could be assigned to any other duty without neglecting the duty that Congress intended he should perform.

In 1906 we appropriated for the inspection force of the Interior Depatrment $250,000. The Secretary of the Interior used but $180,000 of the money, and $70,000, in round numbers, was turned back into the Treasury.

In addition to the fact that the Secretary of the Interior had a larger appropriation than he could use, the Department of Justice had a large surplus or an unexpended balance which could be used in securing evidence, preparing cases, and presenting them to the courts. So there was no restriction upon this work on the part of Congress in 1906. In 1907 and 1908 will be found the same condition of unused balances returned by these departments.

Now, let us note the fiscal year 1909, when this restriction was placed upon these 65 men, and many of the people of the country led to believe that that restriction extended to the whole inspection and special-agent force employed in the various departments of this great Government of ours. For that year we gave the Secretary of the Interior $250,000 additional money. What for? To investigate land frauds. He had $250,000. We made it a half million dollars, the greatest sum ever appropriated in the history of the Government for this purpose.

It went on the bill at the time when this restriction, applying only to these few men, went on the bill. We increased the appropriation for the expenses of hearings in land entries and for the expenses of hearings held by order of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to determine whether alleged fraudulent entries had been made or not, and so forth, from $9,000 to $35,000, an increase of $26,000. We increased the appropriation for expenses of the Department of Justice also.

It is evident and made clear, I think, in this report that the Secretary of the Interior and the Attorney-General were not satisfied with the arrangement of transferring secret-service agents to their departments to make these investigations of land frauds. You will note by the evidence of the Secretary of the Interior that he said that these secret-service agents went out to investigate land frauds, but he did not know what they were doing. He had in charge the administration of the law under his department; yet there was a force of men out there making investigations as to violations of that law, and he did not know whether they were trying to make up new cases or investigating old ones.

He took up the matter with the Attorney-General, and the Attorney-General advised him that he did not know what they were doing—whether they were investigating old cases or were trying to work up new ones—and out of that state of affairs came the arrangement between the Attorney-General and the Secretary of the Interior that these investigations ought to be taken up in the proper way—through the Land Office and through the Department of Justice.

When they came to Congress we gave them every dollar of money they asked to carry out their purpose. In fact, in the last five years Congress has continually increased the appropriations for this purpose, until we have built up an inspection service whose members, if they were to march through the streets of Washington to-day, would make an army as compared with the force we had a few years ago.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to me for a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like, before the Senator passes from that, to learn, if he can inform us, how these secret-service men, who belonged in the Treasury Department, happened to become engaged in the investigation of frauds connected with the Interior Department if neither the Secretary of the Interior nor the Attorney-General knew anything about it. Who sent them?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I hope, Mr. President, if this investigation continues long enough, to be able to answer the inquiry of the Senator from Ohio. I can not answer it to-day. The Committee on Appropriations simply undertook by this first report to point out as nearly as possible the effect that this limitation has had upon the suppression of crime; and if the effect had been to prevent a proper administration or to suppress crime, the Committee on Appropriations would have promptly recommended a change in the law. But, judging from the information we have received, it has not in any manner prevented any department of this Government from making every investigation that ought to have been made, and I may say any that could be thought of by anyone to bring about the suppression of crime and bring the guilty to justice.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senator from Indiana, who has just made this report, to state to the Senate, if he thinks it worth while, on the point he is bringing out, what the Secretary of the Interior said—that instead of being in any way assisted by the intrusion of the Secret Service in his department he has been embarrassed. If the Senator thinks that is worth while, I wish he would read here what the Secretary said about it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I shall——

Mr. HALE. If the Senator proposes to read it later, very well.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I shall later on read just what the Secretary said in that regard. It is true the Secretary of the Interior was embarrassed and the Department of Justice was embarrassed by the interference of these secret-service agents in the work of investigating land frauds.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Can the Senator tell me whether the investigations of the subcommittee have enabled him to answer this question: If the Department of Justice, Attorney-General Bonaparte, did not have control of these men, and if Secretary Garfield did not have control of them, who did?

Mr. HEMENWAY. They were under the control of the Chief of the Secret Service.

Mr. TILLMAN. Who is he; and under whose control is he?

Mr. HEMENWAY. He was under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, so far as the records show.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know, of course, that he is under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury in general, but under whose control was he acting in this particular business; by whom were the orders given?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I would prefer, if the Senator will permit me, to proceed.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but that seemed to be such a remarkable condition that I did want to find out if possible, right now and here, who had them under control.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask him one other question at this point?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator stated that the small number of secret-service men had been increased until if they were to march through the streets of the city of Washington to-day it would appear as if there were a whole army marching. That was rather an impressive figure of speech. I should like to have the figures themselves, if the Senator can give them. How many of these secret-service men have we in the employ of the Government, if the Senator's investigation has yet proceeded far enough to enable him to state?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It has not proceeded far enough for me to make an accurate statement as to the number of inspectors. They are not called secret-service men, but they do similar work and have the same powers, but are simply given a different title. I have gone far enough to know that there are more than 3,000 men now in the secret-service and inspection work of the Government, to say nothing about the men we have under the pure-food law and the meat-inspection law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Could the Senator tell us how many there were five years ago or three years ago?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I could not give exact figures, but quite a number less. In fact, they have doubled and trebled during the last few years——

Mr. TILLMAN. Quadrupled, quintupled?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I would not wish to make that statement unless I were sure of the matter.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will indulge me a little bit further. I ask this question because I saw it stated in a public address by a Member of the House in connection with the Appropriations Committee that at the close of President McKinley's administration we had only 167 such men on the pay rolls of the United States, and that we now have more than 3,000, and that the appropriations on that account for last year, or perhaps the year before, amounted to nearly $10,000,000; something in excess of $9,000,000. It was rather startling.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I should like to proceed. In addition to the fact that we gave the Secretary of the Interior $250,000 more than he had the previous year—making a half a million dollars—and in addition to the fact that we increased the other appropriation for investigations by the Commissioner of the General Land Office from $9,000 to $35,000, we increased the appropriation for the Forestry Service from $1,200,000 to $3,151,000, an increase of $1,950,000, and under the law it was permitted to transfer to any department of the Government having in charge the enforcement of the laws relating to the forestry any of these men provided for under this appropriation to assist in enforcing the law. In other words, out of this great appropriation they have the power specifically given to them in the appropriation to transfer to any department or bureau of the Government any of these men to assist in enforcing the law.

They have the power, further, to assist the States of the Union in enforcing the law. So that, so far as the appropriations for the fiscal year 1909 are concerned as relate to the Interior Department and the enforcement of the land laws and the other laws that are under the Interior Department, we have given $250,000 increase in one item, $26,000 increase in another item, and they have the benefit of this large appropriation under the agricultural act in addition.

What was taken away from them? All of this was added, and what was taken away? By the testimony of Secretary Garfield only one man had ever been assigned to the Interior Department from the Secret Service of the Treasury Department, and that man had not been at work in the Interior Department during the last fiscal year.

Now, let us see as to the Department of Justice. It is claimed——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not quite understand what the Senator said in relation to the appropriation of $3,151,000 for the Forestry Division. He does not mean to say that any part of that money was used for the Secret Service?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no. I simply say this: That under the law——

Mr. SMOOT. Under the law it could have been done.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It could have been used, as is specifically stated in the law, by any department or bureau of the Government to aid in enforcing the law relating to our timber lands.

Mr. SMOOT. But you do not claim that any of it was so used?

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; because the trouble has been we have given the Interior Department so much money to spend of their own that they could not spend it all, and they had no occasion to call for the services of these men.

Mr. SMOOT. So far as the $3,151,000 for the Forestry Bureau is concerned, I think every dollar has been accounted for, and I do not think one dollar of it ever went to the Secret Service.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I am not criticising the appropriation in the slightest, so far as this item is concerned. I am simply trying to point out to the Senate that so far as concerns the charge that Congress hampered the Interior Department in detecting crime and enforcing the law, that charge is erroneous and ought never to have been made.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. It follows, if the Senator's statement is true, and I think the facts bear him out—that Congress in nowise has hampered the executive branch of the Government in ferreting out crimes—that the charge made that Congressmen were afraid of being investigated must also fall to the ground.

Mr. HEMENWAY. When I get through with my remarks I think I shall have convinced myself at least, whether I do anyone else or not, that the charge ought to fall to the ground.

Now, as to the Department of Justice, it might be inferred that this department was in some way hampered in making investigations. I make this statement, and I make it upon the authority of evidence from the Department of Justice, that they have complete power to investigate every crime against the Government, with the possible exception of counterfeiting, and that is because we make a specific appropriation to investigate counterfeiting. They have power to investigate every crime for which investigation a specific appropriation is not otherwise made. So there is no crime against the Government that can not be investigated by the Department of Justice or by one of the other departments of the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Department of Justice has a force for that purpose.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Department of Justice, following out the agreement made by the Secretary of the Interior and the Attorney-General, has been provided with a secret-service force of its own, and now has 40 men engaged on that work, and has power and funds to increase that force, because, as Senators well know, the Department of Justice has had a fund which it has carried over since the appropriation of a half million dollars was made to investigate trusts and to employ lawyers, to employ detectives, to be used in the discretion of the Attorney-General in ferreting out crime, and the department has had a balance from that appropriation for a number of years since the original appropriation was made. In fact, it has had more funds on hand each year than it could expend.

So no one can claim, Mr. President, that the Department of Justice has been hampered in ferreting out crime, in preparing its cases, in having detectives to look up evidence, and watch juries, or in doing anything that can be done to bring to justice men who are guilty of crime against the Government.

Now, then, I want to make the further statement that if Congress had not appropriated sufficient funds to make these investigations of crime and to bring the criminals to justice, there might be some warrant in criticising the action of Congress. But I call upon any Senator to point out any single recommendation that has come to Congress in the last five years for the appropriation of funds to suppress crime or prosecute criminals that has not been promptly complied with. If the executive department of the Government has failed in enforcing the laws, it can not properly be charged to Congress. The fault is well explained by the efficient Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Garfield, in his testimony before the House committee, where he says their own officers have been negligent. He says:

Our own officers have been negligent in not using good common sense in acting upon cases that have come before them. The basis of the land system is the work of the register and the receiver. If you have not men that are straight, with knowledge of their districts, and with legal ability on the part of the register and of ordinary business sense on the part of the receiver, then we are going to have things radically wrong.

Congress does not appoint the registers and receivers, and is not responsible for the fact that men of this character have been placed in office. Then Congress ought not to be charged with responsibility for their inability to enforce the law.

He says further:

I think that much of the difficulty in land administration has been due to the failure to get the right sort of men as registers and receivers, and we have made a very great effort, and have had the hearty cooperation of the Members of the House and Senate in getting a better class of men for these positions, so that now we have very much less difficulty of that kind than we had before.

I want to pause long enough to congratulate Secretary Garfield upon being one man who has been willing in the present state of the public mind to compliment the House and the Senate, and to say that the Members of the House and the Senate have heartily cooperated in securing proper men for those positions.

Further, the inspection service that has gone into these offices during the last year has caused a number of recommendations, resulting in changes of registers and receivers, because they were men not fitted to carry on the work in the way that it ought to be carried on. (P. 482, sundry civil hearings, Jan. 30, 1909, H. R.)

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Senator will allow me for a minute. The Secretary makes this statement, and he is sustained by the Department of Justice, that in the fiscal year up to date there has been more done in the way of proper administration of the law than during any other similar period in the history of the Government. Yet this limitation was on the sundry civil act during the time when there has been more accomplished in the way of suppressing crime than during any other similar time in the history of the Government.

I can understand how men are ambitious to have more power, and how the head of the Secret Service Division would have liked to have had all of the inspection service of the United States under his control and deal them out to the various departments and have them report to him. That was one of his dreams. But the Attorney-General did not believe in it. The Secretary of the Interior did not believe in it. The other heads of departments did not believe in it. The evidence that our committee has secured proves beyond question that it would be a mistake.

We have the further statement from the Department of Justice that from an economical standpoint we save thousands of dollars by having the inspection service under the Department of Justice, where crime has to be looked into, cases worked up, witnesses secured by men who are competent to know what it takes to make their case. Senators sitting here to-day who have practiced law know that the first accomplishment necessary in a good lawyer is to know what he has to prove to make his case.

One of the objections to the use of secret-service men in the land-fraud cases was that they did not know what it required to make a case, and the result was that in Colorado, where many indictments were returned, cases had to be dismissed because the evidence did not sustain them. I want to say to the Senate of the United States and to the country that it is a very serious proposition to indict a man and bring him into court, and to that extent destroy his reputation, and then have to say, "It was all a mistake; there is not evidence enough to convict."

I heard the Senator from Montana on the floor of the Senate tell how this occurred in his State. Some 90 or 100 innocent men, as the record shows, were brought into court, their reputations destroyed. Many of them had been kept in jail. When the time came to try them the prosecution had to say, "We can not support our case."

Then, it is necessary for the protection of the citizen that men who are sent out to make these investigations have sufficient intelligence and sufficient knowledge of the law to know when they have secured the necessary evidence, and not bring men into court and afterwards turn them loose with reputations destroyed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Indiana has just mentioned the incompetency, or the unfitness, of receivers and registers of land offices as being the source of much of this trouble. I want to inquire whether they are appointed under the civil service.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I understand not.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then the President himself appoints them from the best information he can obtain, or for some other reason.

Mr. HEMENWAY. They are appointed by the President.

Mr. TILLMAN. The President the other day vetoed a bill in regard to the census, because the employees were not to be appointed as the result of civil-service examination; and yet he himself or his secretary does not follow that plan in regard to getting good men for this service.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. In further answer to the Senator from South Carolina, I will state that the President never appoints registers or receivers, however, unless they are agreed to by the Senators and Representatives in the land-office district.

Mr. TILLMAN. Unless they happen to come from the South.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, that may be true, but I mean, generally speaking.

Mr. FORAKER. Or from Ohio. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do.

Mr. CARTER. The registers and receivers of the land offices of the country are appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and in the long years during which these officers have been regularly appointed and have regularly served I think the records will show that no more efficient or faithful body of public servants has ever been sworn into the service of the Government in any capacity.

Within the last fifty years there have been very few cases indeed of misconduct and a trifling number of cases of embezzlement or misappropriation of money, notwithstanding from seven to ten million dollars were collected every year from public lands through these officers. If the record of the appointments under civil service could be compared with the record made by this class of officers the civil service would suffer most seriously by the comparison. The greatest possible care is exhibited in the selection. As a rule the register, a quasi judicial officer, is a lawyer; and the receiver is an expert accountant. I doubt if any process of examination would produce as able or competent a body of men as the registers and receivers are and have been.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will be through in just a moment.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Indiana will permit me, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question. Does the Senator disagree, then, with Mr. Garfield in his statement?—

I think that much of the difficulty in land administration has been due to the failure to get the right sort of men as registers and receivers.

Does the Senator agree with Mr. Garfield?

Mr. CARTER. The registers and receivers, who have their offices at stated places, have been expected of recent years by the Interior Department to go into the country frequently a hundred or two hundred miles to inspect land. They have not been provided with traveling expenses or with means of locomotion except to go on foot. In consequence, I think the department has expected more than the provision made by the Government will supply.

Mr. TILLMAN. Just tell me whether Mr. Garfield is right or wrong. Are these good men or are they bad men?

Mr. CARTER. From my knowledge, Mr. Garfield is not borne out by the facts in the case if, as the Senator avers, he states that the officers referred to are bad men. The Senator may not understand the Secretary.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to say a word on that subject.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to conclude my speech, and then I will yield the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana declines to yield.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. President, in submitting the report from the committee we have simply tried to determine the facts, and I think they demonstrate that this limitation upon the sundry civil bill, which did not apply to more than 65 men, and now to 56 men, has in no way hampered the detection of crime or prevented the bringing of criminals to justice. The increased appropriations given to various departments of the Government bear out my statement that if there has been any lax administration, if criminals have gone unpunished, the departments have not performed their duty, and they can not charge it to Congress. Congress has given them every dollar they have asked for and given them every opportunity and every encouragement to detect crime and enforce the law.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I have no doubt the statement has been made, but I have not happened to see it, and perhaps there are others who have not, as to the reasons, if any have been assigned, for the amendment placing the limitation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The reasons grew out of the fact stated by me in the early part of my remarks. The Secretary of the Interior and Attorney-General, from evidence shown in this report, had discovered that these men were making investigations as to land frauds, and they had no means of knowing what the investigations were, whether there had been a duplicate investigation. Detectives from the Secret Service were inspecting a matter pertaining to the Land Office, under the charge of the Secretary of the Interior, and if crime was discovered the law must be enforced by the Department of Justice; but these detectives did not report to the head of either department, but reported back to the Chief of the Secret Service. It was bad administration. I do not think any man who has had any experience in legislation or in executing the law would for a minute encourage such administration.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me, was it not at the suggestion of these officers that it was done?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not know.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say just one word regarding the question of registers and receivers of the land office which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] put. There has been in the past a very lax administration of the land laws of the country, which has resulted in extensive frauds upon and evasions of the law, and many prosecutions have been pending in that region with reference to such frauds. Secretary Garfield, since he assumed his office, has taken the view that it is fully as important to prevent these frauds in the future and to reform the administration of the law as it is to punish those who have offended against the law. He has been particularly insistent that good men should be appointed as registers and receivers; he has sought the cooperation of Senators and Representatives from the West in that direction; and he has, according to his own statement, secured that cooperation.

In my judgment, Mr. Garfield is one of the most efficient Secretaries of the Interior we have had. I have not within my experience known any official who has been more persistent in inquiring upon the ground itself into all matters relating to our Indian Service, our Land Service, and our Irrigation Service. He has thoroughly familiarized himself with all the problems of the West by personal contact with the enterprises themselves and by personal contact with western men, and he has in all instances sought to bring into cooperation with him the best sentiment of the West.

I regret very much to learn that Mr. Garfield is not included in the next Cabinet to carry on the good work that he has already inaugurated.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I just want to say that if I heard the reading of the report correctly, the enormous sum of more than $10,000,000 has been spent in the Secret Service of the Government, and there is an army of men engaged in that service.

For the information of the chairman of the committee and the Senate, I wish to show in a few moments how some of this money is being spent and the character of the men who compose this grand army of the Republic.

I had occasion at the last session, Mr. President, to criticise the report of the Attorney-General, in which he said there was peonage in North Carolina. I thought it was a slander, and I believe now that it was a slander upon my State. I stated in that speech that there had been no peonage cases in North Carolina except in the extreme eastern and extreme western parts of the State, where certain foreigners had come down for the purpose of building railroads, and there were some indictments, but every man who was tried was acquitted, and the district judge had said that the prosecutions were frivolous.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate to a very significant fact. After I had made those few remarks here in the Senate it was announced in the papers of my own particular section of North Carolina, to wit, in the Piedmont section, that detectives there were on the track of the cotton-mill men of North Carolina and that certain leading men in my State had been indicted for peonage. It turned out on the trial that was held a few weeks ago that this great Government of ours had gone to North Carolina and employed as detectives discharged cotton-mill hands who could not prove a good character in court. The cases were tried. There were indictments had against leading men in my State. Charges were brought by detectives, self-convicted criminals, employed at $2 a day, men of infamous character; and so flimsy was the testimony, so outrageous the prosecution, that the judge upon the bench felt called upon to go out of his way to criticise this great Government for bringing such charges against these good men of a great State.

I desire the Secretary to read from the report of that trial. I want the committee to hear it. I want to show the country how the people's money is being spent and wasted by the Government in indicting and trying good citizens of this country upon frivolous charges. I want the country to know what the judge on the bench says. I want the country to know the character of the witnesses and the character of the detectives employed by the Department of Justice. I ask that the Secretary read from one of the leading newspapers—one of the best papers in the country, the Charlotte Observer—what the judge said, what the lawyers said, what the witnesses testified, and what the paper said editorially, and let there be an end of such prosecutions upon such frivolous charges.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina that the paper submitted by him be read by the Secretary? Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], but this whole proceeding is by unanimous consent. A very important appropriation bill is ready for the consideration of the Senate. I had hoped to be able to take it up and, as there is not likely to be any contest upon it, to conclude it this afternoon in order that the Senate might, in view of to-morrow and the next day, adjourn until Monday.

Mr. OVERMAN. It will take only a few minutes. There is only one column anyway.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is not in any way a man who takes up time here unnecessarily. I am not going to interfere with him, but I appeal to Senators to allow business to proceed. After the paper has been read I think I must make an objection to the continuation of this debate.

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the paper.

The Secretary read as follows:

[The Charlotte Observer, Saturday, December 19, 1908.]

THE "PEONAGE" CASE FIASCO.

The cotton manufacturers and other employers of labor in North Carolina wil be heartened by the clear-cut certain sentences which Judge Boyd uttered in the United States district court here yesterday to the jury which brought in a verdict of "not guilty" in the alleged "peonage" cases against reputable citizens of Gaston County. He concurred in the verdict and expressed in vigorous terms his opinion regarding cases which are brought on flimsy evidence and with no legitimate end in view. It is safe to say that no more "peonage" cases which have no substantive basis to rest upon will be brought in his court; and with the outcome here yesterday and the result of the English immigrant cases at Greensboro about two years ago in mind, it is reasonably safe to say that the so-called "Department of Justice" at Washington will not soon again institute frivolous prosecutions against honest men in this federal district of North Carolina.

* * * * * * *

CHARLOTTE CASES.

The facts connected with the recent prosecutions of Andrew B. Moore, manager of Loray Mills; B. J. Dobbins, superintendent of the Loray Mills; L. H. Moore, bookkeeper of the Loray Mills; and J. W. Prim, superintendent of the Anchor Mills, of Huntersville, make an interesting story. It seems that the great United States Government has a special department at Washington that is giving its attention to the offense of peonage, and as is usually the case is looking to the South for violations of the offense. These people up there seem to have an idea that as the South was once a slaveholding country, that she is still trying to uphold that institution and to enforce "involuntary servitude." Some government officials have been "nosing" among dissatisfied and irresponsible people and have discovered many "mares' nests."

The bill of indictment was served upon the gentlemen above named, but when the case came for trial, there was not a vestige of offense on most of the accounts in the bills of indictment; and as to those cases where there was what the lawyers call a "scintilla of evidence," it was so flimsy that the jury could not hesitate a single moment in deciding the cases. All of these men who were charged with this offense denied in the most emphatic language that they ever at any time attempted to make any man work in the mill against his will. Indeed, they say, it would be the height of folly to attempt to force a man to work in the mill, for the reason that a dissatisfied employee could with the greatest ease wreck the machinery and do more damage in one minute than could be repaired in many weeks. So that, as a matter of fact, no mill owner wants to force an employee to work in his mill.

THE STAR WITNESS.

But the curious thing about the cases just tried against Messrs. Moore and Dobbins was that one Ed McFadden was the star witness; and strange as it may seem, it is yet true that McFadden was the man who had himself been an employee of the Loray Mills, and he claimed that he was the one who had held these several parties as peons. In other words, he was the real guilty man according to his own confession; and yet, instead of prosecuting McFadden, the great United States Government employed him to get up evidence to convict Moore and Dobbins of being participants in his crime. McFadden testified that the government agents paid him $2 per day and all his traveling expenses while he went around with them working up these cases against Moore and Dobbins.

LAWYERS ROAST THE GOVERNMENT.

It is not surprising that with this state of affairs the lawyers for the defendants gave the Government a good roasting. Mr. Tillett, in his argument for the defendants before the jury, stated that there seemed to be something behind these prosecutions, and there seemed to be somebody somewhere who was trying to disturb our labor conditions and threaten and intimidate our cotton-mill men. He referred in scathing language to the spectacle presented in this case, in which the money of the Government, which belongs to all the people, was being spent to hire a self-convicted offender to go about the country and get up testimony to punish other people for his own wrongdoings. He showed what an outrageous wrong was done to have innocent men, men of the highest standing and respectability, arrested and hauled before the courts upon charges furnished by such a man as McFadden, and he asked the jury to give a sharp rebuke to such prosecutions and to let the authorities at Washington and elsewhere know that such proceedings could not be tolerated and that they might as well stop spending the Government's money in this way. His appeal was that our cotton-mill men be let alone and be allowed to work out for themselves the many and difficult problems that confronted them. Mr. Mangum, of Gastonia, also spoke for the defendants along the same line.

JUDGE BOYD'S POSITION.

A good many people have an idea that the federal court is a foreign institution, but it should be borne in mind that this court is made up of our own people. Judge Boyd is a native and citizen of this State, and all the jurors are citizens of this State and likewise the other court officials. It is not surprising, then, that the jury not only promptly returned a verdict of not guilty in the case, but that Judge Boyd delivered himself in clear language condemning unreservedly such prosecutions as these. He seemed to think that it was well enough to let the people who were stirring up such charges know that it was useless to bring them into his court where there was no more foundation for them than there was in these cases. It is thought that Judge Boyd's wholesome remarks from the bench will serve to put a quietus upon this business for a while at least.

LET US HAVE PEACE.

The Observer makes bold to express the hope that with the incoming administration Mr. Taft, who has manifested a friendly disposition to the South, will put men in the saddle in the Department of Justice, and elsewhere, who will not have any desire to harass and vex the southern people with unjust and vexatious prosecutions. Nobody here wishes to permit any slavery or peonage, but the Government can not afford to be relying upon the statement of every dissatisfied and unscrupulous employee and bring before the courts our "captains of industry" and men who are doing more than any others for the upbuilding of our material prosperity. In the language of General Grant, "Let us have peace."

During the reading of the foregoing paper.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6484) to establish postal savings banks for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Secretary will resume the reading of the paper.

After the reading of the paper had been concluded,

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent that 2,000 extra copies of the report I have just filed be printed for the use of the Senate. Quite a number of Senators have asked that additional copies be supplied.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. A good many Senators, as the morning hour has been cut off, have matters to present in the ordinary run of morning business. I should like to have unanimous consent to take up the naval appropriation bill, and then I will not try to proceed with it until the morning business has been completed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 26394) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes. Without objection, the bill is before the Senate, and at the request of the Senator from Maine it will be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 16743) for the removal of the restrictions on alienation of lands of allottees of the Quapaw Agency, Okla., and the sale of all tribal lands, school, agency, or other buildings on any of the reservations within the jurisdiction of such agency, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

LANDS IN KOOTENAI COUNTY, IDAHO.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 8822) providing for the relinquishment by the United States of certain lands to the county of Kootenai, in the State of Idaho. An exigency exists in this case; public work is being retarded; and there is no controversy about the matter.

Mr. HALE. And there will be no debate?

Mr. HEYBURN. No debate at all.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides for the relinquishment by the United States unto the county of Kootenai, in Idaho, of all of its right, claim, or title to or possession of a certain piece or parcel of land situated in Kootenai County, in the State of Idaho, being a part of lot 49, which is a portion of the Fort Sherman Military Reservation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DEPEW subsequently said: I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 27970) to amend section 8 of the act approved May 28, 1908, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to navigation, and for other purposes," to report it favorably without amendment. As the bill is very brief, I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which he has just reported. Is there objection?

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, at the last session there was enacted a bill which I introduced at the request of certain marine bodies in New York for the purpose of putting life lines and other methods of protection on scows going out to sea. It was meant to apply only to scows which went beyond the harbor. This bill is intended to restrict the operation of that act to such scows, and not to have its provisions apply to those which work simply in the harbor of New York. The bill has passed the other House.

Mr. KEAN. While this matter is up, I want to ask the Senator from New York if he has ascertained whether this will assist the people engaged in the shad fisheries, who are now for-bidden under the law passed last year even to go out in boats and draw in their nets?

Mr. DEPEW. It will assist, as I understand, all that class of boats that do not go out to sea that are now compelled to obey those regulations and put life lines and other paraphernalia on their scows, which it is impracticable for them to do.

Mr. KEAN. Then it will relieve the people engaged in the shad fisheries?

Mr. DEPEW. It is intended to do that.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, we are unable to hear the conversation which is going on on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, this bill relates to scows in New York Harbor which carry out the refuse of the city of New York and dump it into the ocean. It is utterly impossible for them to have life lines or ropes. All the bill does is to relieve them from that requirement.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand this is a House bill which has been reported favorably from the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. DEPEW. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been favorably reported from the Committee on Commerce by the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], who has asked unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. HALE. It will not give rise to debate?

Mr. DEPEW. No.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the requirements in regard to life line or rope contained in section 8 of the act approved May 28, 1908 (being chap. 212, Stat. L., 1st sess. 60th Cong.) entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to navigation, and for other purposes," shall not apply to any scow or boat the deck outside the coaming or rail of which shall not exceed 1 foot in width. On any such scow or boat its name or number and owner's name painted in letters and numbers, at least 14 inches long on both ends of such scow or boat, shall be a compliance with the provisions of the said section in regard to name, number, and owner's name.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few remarks on what is known as the "Brownsville affair," and I ask that Senate bill 5729 be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HALE. Yes, Mr. President, for the present; though, of course, I do not want the naval appropriation bill displaced.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill referred to by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HALE. Let the title of the bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5729) to correct the records and authorize the reenlistment of certain noncommissioned officers and enlisted men belonging to Companies B, C, and D of the Twenty-fifth U. S. Infantry who were discharged without honor under Special Orders, No. 266, War Department, November 9, 1906, and the restoration to them of all rights of which they have been deprived on account thereof.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, on the night of the 13th of August, 1906, the people of the town of Brownsville, a population of six or eight thousand, retired in supposed perfect safety and protection. There were three companies of United States soldiers stationed in the town, organized, armed, equipped, and salaried by the people of the United States, including the people of Brownsville, to protect all the people of the United States, including the people of Brownsville. They were sworn to this effect. These soldiers were negroes—about 150 in number.

About midnight of this day a fusillade of high-power guns was turned loose upon the houses and the sleeping occupants thereof, and upon any who happened to be in the streets; and one man was killed in his house, a lieutenant of police had his arm shot off, and another man was slightly wounded in the hand. This murderous assault was made without the least warning to any citizen of the town, and upon the population who were resting in supposed perfect security.

The eyes of all who were in eyeshot of the firing immediately turned upon the assassins, and to the astonishment of the populace they were discovered to be negro soldiers. Their flight to the barracks where the three companies were quartered evidenced, and even demonstrated, that they were members of the three companies, B, C, and D, of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, whom I have just mentioned.

The President of the United States promptly and properly set to work to ascertain whether it were true, as charged in the next day's dispatches, that the soldiers who were organized for the protection of the country and the community where they were stationed, had actually made a raid upon a peaceable town and shot its citizens who were in the peace of the Commonwealth. He ascertained beyond doubt that soldiers of these three companies, and they alone, were the murderers, and then set agencies to work to ascertain, if possible, which particular soldiers were the principals engaged in the murder of one citizen, maiming of another for life, wounding another, and shooting into houses where men, women, and children were asleep, and endangering their lives.

He was unable to fix with certainty the identity of the ones who did the shooting, but he became thoroughly convinced that practically all the members of these three companies knew who did the shooting or were cognizant of facts which would disclose the identity of the real perpetrators of the murderous act, if they would divulge them. The negroes refused to disclose the names of the assassins.

Under this state of facts, what was the President to do? What ought he to do as Commander in Chief of the Army? Here were three companies of soldiers, one-tenth of whom had, "in that noon of night, when thought mounts her zenith with the stars, and graveyards yawn and give up their dead," shot into the houses of an unoffending American town, murdered and maimed its citizens, and the other nine-tenths could disclose the identity of the murderers if they would, and refused to do so. If these soldiers, after the commission of this brutal murder of one citizen and murderous assault upon the whole population of the town, were to go entirely unpunished, they would thereby be encouraged to the commission of other crimes of the same diabolical character, and on a larger scale. If one was to go unpunished all must go unpunished, because it was impossible to name the specific individuals who pulled the triggers of the guns when the shooting was done. It was therefore impossible to punish any soldier, either by the military discipline or by the civil government, on a charge of murder.

Must the President, therefore, leave these men, one-tenth of whom are known to be assassins, in the town of Brownsville to further terrorize the citizens? Imagine the consequences. The people could not afford to retire to their rest at night under such circumstances, and they would naturally provide some means for their defense, and, in doing so, they would endanger the peace of the community, which danger might result in the death of hundreds of citizens and in the destruction of the entire three companies of negro soldiers as well. Would any fair-minded citizen blame the people of the town of Brownsville for so organizing for their protection under such impending threatenings? You would not; you could not blame them.

No fair-minded man can say for a minute that the people of Brownsville could have felt safe in the lives of their men, women, and children if these troops had been left there after the shooting of the night of the 13th of August, 1906, with no punishment inflicted upon anybody. No just man would have put such an infliction upon any community. If that is so with reference to Brownsville, is it not so with reference to every other community in the United States? If they were not fit to remain in Brownsville as an organized body, were they fit to be sent to a town in any other part of the country? If not, then what was the President to do except to discharge them from the army? Not to punish them, but to discharge them from the army, because they were no longer, under the circumstances, of any use to the military service of the country.

You say this is punishment indiscriminately of guilty and innocent alike. This is a mistake; it is not the punishment of anybody. You say men are being punished without trial and without conviction. They are not being punished. They can no longer serve the country with efficiency nor with safety to the citizens of the country, and they must necessarily, therefore, be discharged if the people are to be protected from murder and assassination. This is not punishment of the soldiers, but protection of the lives of the people.

If you had a bushel of wheat one-tenth of which was saturated with poison and you could not discriminate between the healthy and the poisonous wheat, you would reject it all. You would not give the wheat thus contaminated to a horse, nor would you give bread made from it to a dog.

If a hundred and fifty American citizens were on board a ship and one-tenth of them had been exposed to yellow fever or smallpox or cholera, and you could not distinguish those who had from those who had not been so exposed to these plagues or diseases, you would not permit one of the cargo of passengers to land upon our shore. It would not be a punishment of the innocent without trial; it would be an exigency which would necessitate their exclusion for the protection of the health and lives of the people of the country. So in this case, the exclusion of all the members of the Companies B, C, and D, of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, was not a punishment of the innocent with the guilty, but it was a necessity that could not be avoided by any power of the military or civil government. The people are not for the army, but the army is for the people. When any company or companies of soldiers are no longer of any service to the country it is the right of the country and the duty of the Government to disband them. More especially is this so when any company or companies, in their organization, are dangerous to the lives and peace of the people.

But a resolution was introduced by the senior Senator from Ohio to investigate the action of the President and the Secretary of War in disbanding these three companies. That able, learned, and distinguished Senator is to be congratulated on the triumph in the Senate which seems now to be almost within his grasp. At the outset he seemed to have before him a hopeless task. It is fair to say that at least one-half of the Republican Senators and all the Democratic Senators were opposed to the bill which he presented at the conclusion of the investigation that proceeded from the resolution that he introduced. Now, if present indications are worthy of credence, it seems that he will be able to rally nearly the entire support of the Republican Members of the Senate for his bill. He has accomplished this against the power and influence of the administration. Grappling with the administration in mortal political combat with one hand, he has been able with the other to compel the hostile Republican party in the Senate into obedient followers of his flag, and this just as he is leaving the Senate. Certainly he is to be congratulated even if his triumph should go no further.

Of course I have no right in this body to say what the President will do with the bill if it should ever get to him; whether he will sign it or veto it. One can scarcely help conjecturing, however, that the President would hardly stultify himself by putting upon the bill the approval of his signature.

I think the President acted with due deliberation in his investigation of the Brownsville affair. I think he had sufficient facts before him to justify him in the course he pursued, and he can hardly be expected now, just as he is going out of office, to attach his signature to a bill that would condemn him in all history. If he gave proper consideration to the case when it was presented to him, and rendered a fair decision upon it, why should he now be expected to confess by the approval of this bill that he was hasty, inconsiderate, and unjust in the one act which, above all other acts of his, should entitle his administration to the esteem of his countrymen?

His discharge of these negro soldiers was absolutely necessary to the security of life and the protection of property. It was necessary for him to discharge these three companies of negro soldiers, or else impose their threatening and dangerous presence upon the town of Brownsville or some other community in the country, one-tenth of whom had demonstrated their capacity to commit brutal, cowardly, and diabolical murder with impunity, and the other nine-tenths either so worthless that under the glaring circumstances they could not detect the least evidence that would point to the criminals, or so base and depraved that they would not disclose the evidence that would lead to the detection of the actual participants in the terrible crime.

No man in the President's position could hesitate for a minute as to what he should do, and the President is entitled to the plaudit, "Well done, good and faithful servant," for the act of discharging the whole worthless band. It is not to be expected now that he will do any act in reference to this matter that will draw a black mark across a course of conduct in the matter deserving of such high commendation.

If they had been white soldiers instead of negroes who were guilty of the murderous affray in Brownsville, I do not believe their discharge by the President would have excited any interest in or provoked any consideration of Congress. But as soon as the President, in the faithful performance of an exalted duty, discharged the murderous band of negroes the anger of the negro race all over the country was aroused.

Almost the entire negro race in the country poured out their wrath upon the President and demanded the restoration of these three companies of negroes to the army. They made no inquiry of the facts, they cared nothing of the guilt of the negroes. It was enough for them that the negroes had murdered white people and not negroes, and that the President had taken steps to prevent the recurrence of such a horrible crime, and that the steps taken by the President discharged the guilty negroes from the army. The negroes, without regard to the merits of the case, made it a race issue and demanded of the President that he surrender to them his judgment and discretion in the performance of this high duty. There were, and are, some negroes who did not, and do not, take this vicious view, but they are the exception and not the rule.

The negro race, with these exceptions, now demands of Congress without regard to the justice or merits of the case that these three companies be restored to the army simply because they are negroes. It is useless to talk of restoring the innocent and excluding the guilty. When I say guilty, I mean the ones who actually did the shooting, for I believe every negro in the three companies is guilty in the sense that every one of them knew who did the shooting and concealed his knowledge of the crime, and is therefore guilty of the grossest breach of discipline. You can not distinguish between those who are guilty of the act and those who are not, and therefore if you restore one you must restore all, including the assassins.

I appeal to you to be careful of what you do in this regard. Do not restore these bloody assassins to the army. Do not give them to understand that their cruel crime is indorsed by the Congress of the United States. I know you do not mean to indorse this crime by the action you take on this bill, but every negro, both in the army and outside of the army, will understand by your passage of this act that you mean to indorse the diabolical crime committed by the negro soldiers in Brownsville.

And why should they not so understand? They understand the traits of the negro, but they do not know that you do not understand them. They know that it was impossible for one-tenth of the negro soldiers to take their guns and ammunition and fire volley after volley into the town not more than 350 yards from the barracks and to arouse both the populace and the soldiers by resounding arms and then return to the barracks ten or twelve minutes after the firing without discovering their identity to any other soldiers. They know further that negroes do not conceal from one another their acts of violence committed against white people. They know that it would have been a matter of boast of the negroes who did the shooting to those who did not participate that they were the heroes of this bloody tragedy.

In the South, when the negroes commit a crime against the white race, they have nothing to fear of disgrace in the estimation of their race. When a negro has been sent to the penitentiary and served his sentence, or is pardoned and returns to his old haunts, instead of with a mark of infamy he returns as one distinguished. They often boast of the fact that they are of such consequence that they have been sent to the penitentiary for crime, and therefore other negroes must beware of incurring their displeasure, because they have upon them the insignia of a dangerous man in the fact that they have served in the penitentiary.

It is no pleasure to me to recount these traits of the negro character. I wish it were not so. But it is so, and the fact that it is so ought to be prominent in the consideration of this question. I can not shirk this duty. I owe its performance to the country in general, and to the people of Mississippi in particular. The people of Mississippi have been and are good to me. I owe it to them when I see a dangerous measure like this impending to give, if I can, the facts that ought to be considered in its aversion, however unpleasant to do.

Let it once be admitted that the criminal actors of the murderous affray at Brownsville were members of the negro companies—and what impartial thinking man could reach any other conclusion—and let it be admitted that it is impossible to distinguish the guilty from the innocent members of the company, admitting for the sake of argument that there are innocent members, and to me the restoration of these three companies to the army is horrible to contemplate. I was about to say the restoration of these companies to the service of the country in the army, but I will not say that, because it is impossible for companies in this state of case to serve the country in the army. Tainted with one-tenth of their number as assassins, nobody could trust them.

The Senator from Ohio spends hours in an exhaustive attempt to show that the most strenuous efforts of the President have been unable to distinguish the guilty from the innocent; that after spending thousands of dollars and weeks and months of labor, the President has been unable to designate a single one of the bloody actors in that tragedy. Not only does the Senator from Ohio contend that the President has been unable to designate one of the criminal actors, but he contends that the President's most strenuous efforts have not been able to throw any reasonable suspicion upon any one. It has been two years and nearly a half since the crime was committed, and if during that time all the efforts that have been exerted have failed to give a single circumstance that would indicate the particular ones that did the shooting, how is it possible for a board composed of five officers to designate any particular ones as the guilty—even if we hold that none are guilty except those who pulled the triggers?

If not, what then is to be the rule? Is every man to be presumed innocent until proof points conclusively to his guilt? If so, the enactment of this bill will be virtually to restore the three companies entire, because it will be impossible to distinguish the ones who did the shooting from those who did not participate. Admitting the guilt of some—about one-tenth of the three companies—does any Senator want these guilty assassins in the army? If he does not want them in the army, is he so solicitous to have the other nine-tenths in the army that he is willing to vote the one-tenth of the number who are assassins of the blackest type into the army in order to put the other nine-tenths in the army uniform?

But let us reverse the case. If it is the proposition to only restore those who can prove their innocence, how is that going to be done? You can not prove the innocence of a part of these three companies unless you prove the guilt of the other part, and, if, as the Senator from Ohio has said, it is impossible to prove that any particular ones did the shooting you can not prove the guilt of anyone. You can not prove the innocence of one without proving the innocence of all. If, as has been suggested, all who will swear they are innocent shall be permitted to return to the army and draw pay from the time they were discharged, notwithstanding they have not rendered any service during this time, the guilty will be almost compelled to take the oath, lest their failure to do so will be construed as a confession of their guilt. Men who will commit such cold-blooded midnight murder as was perpetrated at Brownsville will not hesitate to blacken their putrid souls with the foulest perjury. So in either point of the dilemma to establish the board would be vain legislation.

If there is any in the three companies who is innocent of the shooting, and innocent of any participation in it, and innocent of any guilty knowledge, and if a hardship has been put upon him, it has been done, not by the President of the United States, but by his own comrades. It will not do to say that he is not responsible for the acts of his comrades, because the answer to that is, neither is the President nor the Secretary of War responsible for the acts of these negroes' comrades. The acts of the guilty ones have made it impossible for those three companies to hereafter serve the country with efficiency, and the Government is no more responsible for this than the most innocent member of the company, if there is such a member.

I reiterate my plea to Senators: Do not vote these negroes back into the army merely because they are negroes, for if you do you will encourage the vicious negroes to believe that it matters not what crime they commit against white men, white women, and white children, they will only have to look to Congress for immunity from responsibility. The lives of many men and helpless women will be sacrificed to this morbidly depraved ignorance of the most vicious and callous element of negroes if they are thus permitted to believe. Some who are thus sacrificed will be themselves negroes murdered by members of their own race; for when a vicious negro gets on the rampage he is liable, for want of better food for his powder, to dip his hand in the blood of his own race. I know you do not intend this result. You do not believe that our knowledge of the negro is accurate and full, nor that our judgment is correct. This is so because you have not been where you could learn the negro traits of character. If you thought our apprehensions were well founded, you would desist, for I am sure you wish us well.

Do not make another mistake. Just after the war the ballot was given to the whole negro race, thereby proclaiming that they were capable of self-government. Their ancestors for thousands of years had been barbarians and cannibals and had made no improvement whatever. They were elevated to a condition of slavery, and within a little more than a hundred years, with no opportunity for improvement, except that given by slavery, they were said to be capable of self-government. That was a tribute to slavery greater than was ever paid to all the learning of Greece or to any other institution.

It is said now by everybody that that was a great mistake. You admit that it was a great mistake. To aggravate the mistake the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution was interpolated. Do not make the mistake now of saying by your votes on this bill that if any organized band of negroes shall commit barbarous assassinations they shall be rewarded by the Government with two and a half years' pay for service they never performed.

It must be admitted that the service of these three companies can not again be useful to the country. If a man's leg is diseased, the surgeons often cut it off to save the body. These three companies are diseased. Cut them off to save the balance of the army. You will poison the army if you return them to its uniform.

We do not desire to do the negro any harm. We have race prejudice, but we do not entertain race hatred. We wish the negro well. We spend hundreds of thousands of dollars trying to provide him with the rudiments of education. We protect him in his life, liberty, and property, and try to point him the way to morality and redemption, but we do not want him to govern us. He is not capable of governing himself.

The Creator, in His infinite wisdom, has made the Caucasian the supreme race of the world. The eye of fancy, in its utmost reach, can not measure the elevation at which the Caucasian race stands above the pure African race in his native jungles. Brought to this country from barbarism and cannibalism, the African was enslaved in all the original States of the Union. One by one the northern States repealed their slave laws, but in some way the negroes of those States nearly all reached slavery in the South. Their numbers in the South almost equaled the numbers of the whites. When they were manumitted and enfranchised they were a menace to the people of the South, and in a measure a menace to the entire country, because that which was a menace to so large a portion of the country as the South carried with it danger to all the country. The North did not know of the danger they incurred. We did know. The North has learned much of the negro, but I fear it has a great deal more to learn than it has yet learned.

We have done the best we could for the negro with the conditions that confronted us at the time of his manumission. He was ignorant, dependent, and shiftless. We had been impoverished by the support of the contending armies of both sections of the country during the war, and at the close of the war by the obliteration of thousands of millions of dollars' worth of property, in which the labor and earnings of our people for a century had been invested.

We had not only to contend against the impoverishment that had been inflicted upon us, but we had to contend with the thriftlessness and ineradicable political ignorance of the negro race. We set to work to improve them as best we could. We had improved his condition in slavery above his condition in his native jungles, and we were now to improve his condition in freedom, a freedom which he neither understood nor appreciated.

When we were rebuilding our fallen fortunes we were sending the negro to school upon the money which we ourselves earned. We have continued to send him to school. In some instances they have attained to a considerable degree of education and have acquired a considerable amount of property. A considerable number of them can read and write. With all this it requires the hand of the white man to hold them up, and they are no more capable of standing upon their own strength to-day than they were at the close of the war.

I say without fear of contradiction from anyone who knows the negro nature, the negro character, and the negro disposition, that you might furnish the brain of every negro in the United States with an academic education, and then withdraw from them entirely the presence of the white people and in less than five generations they would lapse into barbarism. You say that they have not retrograded. It is because the hand of the white man of the South has held them up. I ask northern Senators to study this question. Go where you can learn the facts, and when you learn I know you will remove the weight of your misguided efforts intended for philanthropy completely from us.

As you have become more and more acquainted with conditions in the South you have more and more permitted us to work out our own destiny, both for our welfare and for the welfare of the negro. Continue to acquaint yourselves with conditions and with the negro character and with the negro race. Throw party considerations to the winds. Let the negro go where he will politically. If he is left alone, he will of his own volition and nature abandon politics. He is of an inferior race, but he is not responsible for it. He is not capable of self-government, but he can not help it. He never can be made capable of self-government. He is an object of our sympathy and needs now and always will need our help.

I am willing to help him. One must know him to know how to help him. Those who have been raised with him know him and know how to help him. Let those who do not know him apply themselves to learn. He can not be helped by thrusting him into politics, that for which he has no capacity, and never can have any capacity, and that in which he would never dabble if he were left to his own impulses.

You say that you would not shut the door of hope to the negro. It is a great mistake to suppose that the door of hope is shut to the negro if he is not permitted to hold office and participate in the Government. The door of hope does not necessarily open into office. Thousands of white men never expect nor desire to hold office, yet are of the happiest and have the brightest hopes in this world. No man ought to want to hold office except for the good of his country, and the negro can not hold office for the good of his country.

We are not responsible for this character and deficiency of the negro. A higher, a supreme, power made the decree, and to it we bow. We have not deteriorated the negro; we have improved him. He came to us a barbarian and cannibal, and we turned him loose semicivilized. We continue our efforts to improve him mentally, morally, and spiritually; and if in the course of time, probably thousands of years, at an expense to the white man of hundreds, aye, thousands of millions of dollars, he shall ever be able to stand alone, it is to be hoped that he will be returned to Africa as his own, there to manifest his governmental capacity, but not to govern white people.

The door of hope is open to him if his rights to life, liberty, and property and the pursuit of happiness are protected by the law. His rights to life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness are protected by the law in the South as sacredly as in any other part of the country. Not only so, but he has the advice, encouragement, and help of our people whenever he shows any disposition to do anything for himself. Of course there are individual instances where injustice has been done him, just as there are individual instances where injustice has been done white people, but they are rare and impartially punished. We indulge him more than he is indulged anywhere in the world. With the exception of murder and that crime not to be uttered in this presence, our courts punish him by lighter sentences than white men for the same crimes. With all this, we do not want him to govern us.

We know where two separate and distinct races live together one or the other must control. This law is as immutable as the law of gravity. We know further, and you know, that of these two races one is the superior and the other is the inferior race. We know, and you know, that the Caucasian race is the superior and the negro is the inferior race. Now, I put this to you: Which of the two races do you desire to rule in the South, the Caucasian or the negro race? For I repeat, one or the other must rule.

Your answer is ready, and you would not hesitate to say that you are in favor of the white race ruling, if it is true that one or the other must rule; but you are skeptical of this immutable law. Your skepticism is born of your ignorance of the negro and of race conditions in the South.

How can it be possible that two races, who are so utterly different and distinct that you look with horror upon their amalgamation, can ever be partners in a government where their numbers are anything like equal? They can not do so where there is any considerable number of the inferior race, as the people in the North will in the near future learn. Miscegenation and amalgamation are viewed by you with such horror that no self-respecting white man would tolerate the contemplation of a marriage of one of his family to a negro. When you scorn the idea of taking the race as connubial partners, why offer them political partnership?

Do not force the negro race to dizzy altitudes where they can not stand, much less walk; for they will not only themselves fall from such giddy heights, but they will pull down to destruction those who would be their benefactors.

There are good negroes, and for such we have high regard and good esteem. Around such we throw the ægis of the Caucasian's capacity for democratic-republican self-government, a thing it is impossible for him to do for himself. We protect his life, liberty, property, and pursuit of happiness. Here is a door of real hope open to him, which he can enter and find full fruition, that which he can never find in the pursuit of politics for which he is not capacitated; hope of accumulating a competency for this life; hope of the liberal education of his children; hope of mental, moral, and spiritual improvement; hope of the peace that passeth understanding; and, finally, hope of a home in heaven.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I do not intend to crave the attention of the Senate for longer than a moment, and I rise now to point the question which I asked the Senator from Mississippi a moment ago, which was not answered, which I have asked under different circumstances, and which has not yet been answered, but which sooner or later in this Chamber must be answered.

I think every Senator in the Chamber will agree with the opinion of the country that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is the acknowledged spokesman of the view of that section of the country which is hostile to the voting of its negro population.

Mr. BACON. Why does the Senator say that?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Maine——

Mr. BACON. Why does the Senator say that?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I say it for the reason that the Senator from South Carolina has——

Mr. BACON. Does he occupy any broader view of the question than any other Senator on this floor who is a representative of the South?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana asked me to give him sixty seconds.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is all I intend to take if Senators will not interrupt me, but I can not refuse to answer when I am asked a question.

Mr. BACON. I desire just one minute to say that I do not intend by my question to derogate from the right of the Senator from South Carolina to speak for himself or for his State, but I do say that the Senator from Indiana assumes a great deal when he assumes to say that any Senator speaks for anybody else except for himself and for his particular State.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will not take up the time now to answer the Senator, but if the Senator from Maine will permit me a moment I will answer that later. I merely want to say this, which I think will fulfill my promise to the Senator from Maine——

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator will pardon me for an interruption, I do not think he ought to make that statement, and then proceed to take his seat, without allowing Senators the privilege of contradicting him.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly not.

Mr. MONEY. Will you permit me to say a word?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator pardon me? The Senator from Maine desires to go on with the appropriation bill. I will promise the Senator to bring this up at another time.

Mr. MONEY. I would rather have it go in the RECORD at this moment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator from Maine will pardon me——

Mr. HALE. I think I must call for the regular order, which is the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine demands the regular order, which is the naval appropriation bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 21458) authorizing sales of land within the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation to the Northern Idaho Insane Asylum and to the University of Idaho.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6252) to promote the administration of justice in the navy.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 219) to accept the gift of Constitution Island, in Hudson River, New York, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CAPRON, Mr. CHANEY, and Mr. HAY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 247) relating to the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln and making the 12th day of February, 1909, a legal holiday, and for other purposes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 26394) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with; that the bill be read for amendment; and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with; that the bill be read for amendment; and that the committee amendments be first considered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HALE. For what purpose?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I rose in the first place to address myself to the Chair before the request for unanimous consent to dispense with the formal reading of the bill should be declared as having been submitted and passed upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I interposed an objection for a moment to get an opportunity to inquire of the Senator from Maine if he would not consent that the bill might go over until Monday or Tuesday, at least until the first of next week, and to couple with that request this statement, if I may be indulged for a moment.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs yesterday, printed, and placed upon the desks of Senators for the first time this morning. It is a bill of 74 or 75 pages. It is accompanied by a report which, from the brief examination I have been able to make of it, is not very helpful, at least to me, in arriving at any conclusions with respect to the changes made in the bill as passed by the House.

For one, I should like to have an opportunity to read the bill with some care before it is acted upon and before I am required to vote upon it. I am not a member of the committee which has been accorded ample privilege to know what the bill contains, but I have a certain responsibility to the State which commissions me here with respect to the appropriations which the bill carries—nearly $137,000,000.

Mr. HALE. The amount appropriated is about $137,000,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; about $137,000,000.

I observe that the bill as reported from the Senate committee increases the appropriations made by the House by something over a million dollars, and that the total appropriations provided in the bill are something more than $2,000,000—nearly two and a half million dollars—more than was estimated by the Navy Department.

A great many Senators are absent this afternoon and will be absent to-morrow and Saturday. I know that some of those Senators desire to be present when this bill is considered. They are out of the city in response to invitations to attend, with their fellow-citizens, the Lincoln memorial celebration, which occurs to-morrow in almost every hamlet and village of the country.

It does not seem to me to be an unreasonable request, Mr. President, in regard to a bill as important as this, and of which every member of the Senate, excepting those members upon the Committee on Naval Affairs, can have but little knowledge or information. Those members of the Senate who have had a brief service here of two or three years must rest in entire ignorance of the real significance of these large appropriations, if the bill is to be put through, as I have understood, this afternoon.

I know that the Senator from Maine is very busy. I know that he has service on many very important committees. I assume that that must be the reason for urging the speedy consideration of this bill, immediately following its report. But with all respect to the Senator from Maine and his very heavy responsibilities, it seems to me that other Senators here have certain responsibilities to their constituencies and to the country which they want to discharge, and I know that I voice the wishes of Senators, some of whom are absent, in proffering my request that the bill may go over until Monday.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I can see considerable force in the appeal of the Senator from Wisconsin, that the bill go over. It is an actual fact that, coming as late as it did from the House and receiving reasonable consideration at the hands of the committee, it came in here only yesterday morning, and Senators have not had much time to examine it.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, that is the condition the Senate is met with at the end of every session of Congress, and especially at the end of a short session, which by law dies on the 4th of March.

It is not a question of my being overburdened with work as the foundation of my desire to get the bill through this week. It is a question of the Senate being overburdened with work for the rest of the session. Almost all of the great appropriation bills that will involve subjects of interest and will necessitate debate are still in the House of Representatives and have not reached the doors of the Senate, and unless as fast as the committees having them in charge can report them to the Senate and they be considered, it will be impossible for the Senate to give due consideration to the great subjects embraced in the appropriation bills.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Would the Senator from Maine kindly inform the Senate as to how many appropriation bills remain to be acted upon at this session?

Mr. HALE. The army appropriation bill, the Military Academy appropriation bill, two; the agricultural appropriation bill, three; the Indian appropriation bill, four; the post-office appropriation bill, five; the sundry civil bill, six; the great deficiency bill, seven; and I do not know but the consular and diplomatic bill, making eight.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And this bill, nine?

Mr. HALE. And this one, nine.

Mr. WARREN. And the legislative bill is not yet finished.

Mr. HALE. And the legislative bill has not yet been concluded.

Mr. WARREN. And the fortifications bill?

Mr. HALE. And the fortifications bill.

Mr. PERKINS. And the river and harbor bill?

Mr. HALE. I give it up; I did not know there were so many. Now, the Senator is an old legislator; he is a Member here, with service in this body——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator from Maine permit me, in connection with his statement as to the number of bills remaining to be passed, to make a statement before he proceeds?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As enumerated by the Senator, I understood him to say that there were nine, possibly ten. How many of those bills, if I may make further inquiry, have reached the Senate committees and are in the possession of the Senate?

Mr. HALE. I know of but one, the army appropriation bill.

Now, another thing. I am trying to have a reasonable talk and a colloquy with the Senator; I do not think he is prepared to embarrass the Senate, but does the Senator realize that with the two days which he says will be lost, because Senators are abroad upon other missions, there are only fifteen working days between now and the 4th of March?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Did the Senator pause for me to reply?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I will pause.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator.

I understand how many working days there are left, Mr. President, but I want to direct the attention of the Senator from Maine and of other Senators to a fact in connection with the bills yet remaining to be passed. If I rightly understand the record, this naval appropriation bill was sent to the Naval Committee of the Senate on the 25th of January. Am I correct about that, I would ask the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. I do not know the exact date. I know the committee has had repeated sessions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If committees of the Senate are to hold these bills in the committee rooms for fifteen days and then allow the Senate two or three hours to consider them when they are brought in here for passage, it is possible that we may not be able to conclude the session with all the appropriation bills passed. But if that process could undergo some slight modification, if the committees might give the Senate a small fraction of the large amount of time which they seem to have appropriated to the consideration of this bill, and let us, in some slight measure, know about the legislation that we are passing upon, it seems to me it would be a fairer division of responsibility.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will permit me, I do not see the difficulties that surround the Committee on Appropriations and the committees having charge of the separate appropriation bills, because under the arrangement of the distribution of the work of the Senate a few Senators gather most of it to themselves. A very large number of the Members of this body are not permitted to participate in the important work of the consideration of these bills in committee, because at the beginning of each Congress, through an arrangement which has grown up here, a very limited number of Senators succeed in having themselves assigned to two or three or four of the great committees of the Senate, and in some cases to five, and, of course, it is impossible for them to take all of the business of legislation into their hands without having these bills delayed in committees brought in at the very close of the session and thrust upon the consideration of this body without any opportunity for Senators to know what they are legislating upon.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have no sensitiveness at the intimation that the Committee on Naval Affairs has not been prompt and ready to report this bill earlier. All appropriation bills have to be considered with great care and circumspection in committees. They involve hundreds and thousands of items. The Committee on Naval Affairs had repeated meetings and had the officers of the Government before it. If other appropriation bills had been ready and had been coming over from the House it is possible that the committee might have shortened its time, but not very much, considering the importance of the bill.

Senators must bear in mind that in dealing with appropriation bills the great part of the work, the consideration of the multifarious subjects, must be done in committee. I have no doubt the Senator has in mind a very profound scheme for reforming the usages, the customs, the practice, the habits of Senators, and the way of dealing with these subjects; but he will never get any new plan or any new arrangement that will not commit every appropriation bill to some committee. That committee will have to take it up, and that committee alone will be complete master of the subject when the bill is reported to the Senate. It will be, and it ought to be, subject to the scrutiny of the Senate; but if the Senator and I should join our efforts, particularly in the short session, we should never avoid the difficulty against which the Senator inveighs, especially in such a situation as that which now confronts us, for I have never known matters to be choked——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator let me complete my expression?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I have never known a condition where such a jam, to use the metaphor of the lumbermen, has accumulated as at present. I am not speaking except as the representative of the Senate. If there is undue haste and undue time given at the end of the session, and all bills must be passed, then it is not anything more to me than it is to the rest of the Senate, including the Senator from Wisconsin. All that I am seeking, and all that I have tried to do, is to get this bill before the Senate. If the Senator from Wisconsin is bound, and feels that it is his duty to have more time to consider the bill, that is for him alone to settle and not for me; and it is not for me to find fault, and I do not, for I see how the Senator is situated. I suppose he wants to make an earnest research into this bill and has not had time to do so. Of course Senators understand that when a bill comes over from the other House and is being considered in committee here, they can study that bill if they take the House bill and they will be informed, so far as they can inform themselves, upon nineteen-twentieths of all the subjects that will be up in a bill when reported from the committee of the Senate, because almost the entire body of the bill is covered by the House bill which has been here for two or three weeks.

So far as I am concerned, as the organ of the Senate upon this bill, I am doing all that I can to get it up and to have it considered for the rest of the day and make some progress on it. I do not know, with the hour of 4 o'clock so nigh, that we can finish the bill to-day. I do not think when we consider it that there is likely to be any prolonged conflict, because the committee in reporting it has sought to present a bill that would be commendable and acceptable and avoid conflict. I should like very much—of course, the Senator can, as he has, and that is always the right of a Senator—to ask for the actual reading of all the provisions of the bill of seventy-odd pages, and no one can complain; but it has become part of the accepted routine of the Senate, when an appropriation bill comes up with so many items, that the formal reading is dispensed with for the reason that it is to be considered clause by clause and amendment by amendment as reported, with a complete and unqualified right of amendment on the part of the Senate. I think that practice, Mr. President, has worked well; and yet the Senator, if he interposes that objection, can consume an hour of the time of the Senate in the reading of the bill.

Now, I am only going to say that I am in the hands of the Senate. I do not know; I have not looked into it, but I presume what the Senator says may be correct. I think, however, there is undoubtedly a quorum here now to do business. I do not know but that Senators are going away to-morrow or the next day, so that we can do nothing but lose those days. I am not losing them; I can abide it if the Senate can. I should like to go on, as we do on appropriation bills, and see how far we can proceed with this bill. I have been kept off to-day by things of importance which I could not arrest. I got the bill up as early as possible, and I should like to go on and consider it and get as far along with it as we can until a reasonable hour, or until the Senate is weary, and then I shall, of course, submit it entirely, so far as I am concerned, to the judgment of the Senate. If the Senate, under the conditions which have been disclosed by the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin, feels that Senators have departed or will depart and leave the body either without a quorum or with a bare quorum, which is a thin line in order to do business, it would be useless to come here. I had hoped that we might get the bill up early this morning and that we might pass it to-day, and then, if Senators are leaving or expect to leave or have left already, we could adjourn over until Monday. I have lost the day practically, except perhaps a couple of hours.

Mr. WARREN. Could the Senator not get the bill read?

Mr. HALE. Yes; undoubtedly. If the Senator from Wisconsin insists upon his point of order, I shall ask to have the Senate stay and have the bill read at any rate; and then it will be for the Senate to decide; only I hope it will be borne in mind that it is not the fault of anybody in charge of the appropriation bill if we get into a great jam. Therefore, if the Senator does not object, or if the Senator does not make his point about the reading of the bill, I will ask that we go on with the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I arose to interrupt the Senator from Maine to say just a word in reply to his suggestion that I was considering some scheme of very great reform of procedure in this body, and that no plan could ever be worked out which would improve upon the method of sending bills to committees for their consideration. I am very frank to say to the Senator from Maine that I have thought about the present arrangement of committee appointments in this body; that I have had the temerity to consider whether it might not be possible to make some other arrangement for the appointment of committees which would distribute the consideration of the business of this body more equitably among all the Senators.

It never had occurred to me, Mr. President, that committees should be abolished. I realize that congressional legislation in its first stages must be largely by committees, but I had been led to think—of course I may be all wrong about it, and it may be almost treasonable for one to entertain the idea that there might be any improvement made upon the existing methods of disposing of the membership of this body in the appointment of committees—but, in view of the fact that legislation must be considered by committees, in view of the fact that it is only in committees that you can have that nice and fine consideration of the language of a bill, and in view of the fact that every legislative body must be more or less dependent upon the action of its committees, I have had the hardihood not only to doubt the divine perfection of the present arrangement, but almost to believe that if the business of considering the legislation of the Senate could be distributed among its 92 members instead of being taken in charge by less than one-third of the body it would be an improvement over existing conditions. When I say "the legislation," of course I do not mean the unimportant legislation, but I mean those great subjects which deal with business, with transportation, with finance, those great subjects that go to the prosperity of all of the homes of this country, the great subjects that must absorb the attention of the members of the committee, and which, therefore, it seems to me, ought to be distributed over a larger field for consideration.

Now, Mr. President, I have to confess a very great ignorance with respect to this bill, but I confess also to a very earnest and sincere desire to know something about it. I am not here talking against time or interposing any factious objection, and I shall not do so further than to give to myself, as one member of the Senate, a fair and reasonable opportunity to examine this bill. In doing that I think I am simply discharging an obligation owing to my State and to myself.

Mr. WETMORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will be most happy to yield to the Senator from Rhode Island if he rises to put through, in some acceptable form, the joint resolution making to-morrow a legal holiday in the Territories and in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WETMORE. Mr. President, that is my purpose.

CENTENARY OF BIRTH OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives returning to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 247) relating to the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln and making the 12th day of February, 1909, a legal holiday, and for other purposes.

Mr. WETMORE. Mr. President, this morning the Senate passed a resolution asking the House to return to the Senate House joint resolution 247, which has just been laid before the Senate. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Can that be done under the rule? Does not the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] have to yield entirely under the rule? I observed the rule applied to the Senator from New Hampshire this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The questions are quite different.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I hope the Senator from Indiana will not raise that question on this particular joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not the introduction of a bill nor a petition nor a memorial that is asked, but the consideration of a message from the House of Representatives.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That does not fall, then, within the rule?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does not fall within the prohibition of the rule.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The only reason, I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin, that I raise the question is that this rule is very properly, as I think, being universally applied, and it was the opinion of Senators, until the Chair made it clearer, that the request of the Senator from Rhode Island fell within the rule. It is a very important rule.

Mr. WETMORE. Mr. President, I think this joint resolution ought not to take more than a moment. I hope there will be no objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; none.

Mr. WETMORE. I wish to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution. Before doing so, however, I should merely like to state that I have conferred with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who was the mover in the Senate of the amendment which was adopted. He was perfectly willing, in view of the nearness of the approach of Lincoln's birthday, if this joint resolution came back from the House, to withdraw the amendment, as he did not desire in any way to obstruct its passage.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I was unable to hear what the Senator had to say. I should like to know whether this is simply a proposition to make to-morrow a memorial day for President Lincoln, and a national holiday, or whether it is encumbered with the proposition to build a highway from Washington to Gettysburg?

Mr. WETMORE. The joint resolution simply provides for observing the day, and nothing else.

Mr. HALE. Let the joint resolution be read, and then the Senate will know about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the original joint resolution for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the 12th day of February, 1909, the same being the centennial aninversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, be, and the same is hereby, made a special legal holiday in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States. Be it further

Resolved, That the President be authorized to issue a proclamation in accordance with the foregoing, setting apart the 12th day of February, 1909, as a special legal holiday.

Mr. WETMORE. Do I understand that unanimous consent has been given for the present consideration of the joint resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HALE. I have no objection, if it will give rise to no debate.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the joint resolution will pass without delay.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WETMORE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the votes by which the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read the third time and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and the respective votes are reconsidered.

Mr. WETMORE. Now I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment heretofore adopted by it to the joint resolution of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the joint resolution as it will stand if now adopted be read.

Mr. CULLOM. It has been read just this moment.

Mr. CULBERSON. I was out of the Chamber, and I should like to hear it read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSTITUTION ISLAND.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 219) to accept the gift of Constitution Island in the Hudson River, New York.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. LODGE, Mr. du PONT, and Mr. FOSTER.

COURTS FOR TRIAL OF ENLISTED MEN.

Mr. PERKINS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6252) to promote the administration of justice in the navy, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agrees to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the proposed amendment insert the following:

"That courts for the trial of enlisted men in the Navy and Marine Corps for minor offenses now triable by summary court-martial may be ordered by the commanding officer of a naval vessel, by the commandant of a navy-yard or station, by a commanding officer of marines, or by higher naval authority.

"SEC. 2. That such courts shall be known as 'deck courts,' and shall consist of one commissioned officer only, who, while serving in such capacity shall have power to administer oaths, to hear and determine cases, and to impose, in whole or in part, the punishments prescribed by article thirty of the Articles for the Government of the Navy: Provided, That in no case shall such courts adjudge discharge from the service or adjudge confinement or forfeiture of pay for a longer period than twenty days.

"SEC. 3. That any person in the navy under command of the officer by whose order a deck court is convened may be detailed to act as recorder thereof.

"SEC. 4. That the officer within whose command a deck court is sitting shall have full power as reviewing authority to remit or mitigate, but not to commute, any sentence imposed by such court; but no sentence of a deck court shall be carried into effect until it shall have been so approved or mitigated, and such officer shall have power to pardon any punishment such court may adjudge.

"SEC. 5. That the courts hereby authorized shall be governed in all details of their constitution, powers, and procedure, except as herein provided, by such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe.

"SEC. 6. That the records of the proceedings of the courts hereby authorized shall contain such matters only as are necessary to enable the reviewing authorities to act intelligently thereon, except that if the party accused demands it within thirty days after the decision of the deck court shall become known to him, the entire record, or so much as he desires, shall be sent to the reviewing authority. Such records, after action thereon by the convening authority, shall be forwarded directly to, and shall be filed in, the office of the Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy, where they shall be reviewed, and, when necessary, submitted to the Secretary of the Navy for his action.

"SEC. 7. That no person who objects thereto shall be brought to trial before a deck court. Where such objection is made by the person accused, trial shall be ordered by summary or by general court-marital, as may be appropriate.

"SEC. 8. That the courts authorized to impose the punishments prescribed by article thirty of the Articles for the Government of the Navy may adjudge either a part or the whole, as may be appropriate, of any one of the punishments therein enumerated: Provided, That the use of irons, single or double, is hereby abolished, except for the purpose of safe custody or when part of a sentence imposed by a general court-martial.

"SEC. 9. That the Secretary of the Navy may set aside the proceedings or remit or mitigate, in whole or in part, the sentence imposed by any naval court-martial convened by his order or by that of any officer of the navy or Marine Corps.

"SEC. 10. That general courts-martial may be convened by the President, by the Secretary of the Navy, by the commander in chief of a fleet or squadron, and by the commanding officer of any naval station beyond the continental limits of the United States.

"SEC. 11. That a naval court-martial or court of inquiry shall have power to issue like process to compel witnesses to appear and testify which United States courts of criminal jurisdiction within the State, Territory, or District where such naval court shall be ordered to sit may lawfully issue.

"SEC. 12. That any person duly subpœnaed to appear as a witness before a general court-martial or court of inquiry of the navy, who willfully neglects or refuses to appear, or refuses to qualify as a witness or to testify or produce documentary evidence which such person may have been legally subpœnaed to produce, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, for which such person shall be punished on information in the district court of the United States; and it shall be the duty of the United States district attorney, on the certification of the facts to him by such naval court, to file an information against and prosecute the person so offending, and the punishment of such person, on conviction, shall be a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment not to exceed six months, or both, at the discretion of the court: Provided, That this shall not apply to persons residing beyond the State, Territory, or District in which such naval court is held, and that the fees of such witness and his mileage at the rates provided for witnesses in the United States district court for said State, Territory, or District shall be duly paid or tendered said witness, such amounts to be paid by the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts out of the appropriation for compensation of witnesses: Provided further, That no witness shall be compelled to incriminate himself or to answer any question which may tend to incriminate or degrade him.

"SEC. 13. That persons confined in prisons in pursuance of the sentence of a naval court-martial shall, during such confinement, be allowed a reasonable sum, not to exceed $3 per month, for necessary prison expenses, and shall upon discharge be furnished with suitable civilian clothing and paid a gratuity, not to exceed $25: Provided, That such allowances shall be made in amounts to be fixed by, and in the discretion of, the Secretary of the Navy, and only in cases where the prisoners so discharged would otherwise be unprovided with suitable clothing or without funds to meet their immediate demands.

"SEC. 14. That section sixteen hundred and twenty-four, article thirty-four, Revised Statutes of the United States, is hereby amended as follows: 'The proceedings of summary courts-martial shall be conducted with as much conciseness and precision as may be consistent with the ends of justice, and under such forms and rules as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President; and all such proceedings shall be transmitted in the usual mode to the Navy Department, where they shall be kept on file for a period of two years from date of trial, after which time they may be destroyed, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.'

"SEC. 15. That it shall be lawful for any civil officer having authority under the laws of the United States or of any State, Territory, or District to arrest offenders, to summarily arrest a deserter from the navy or Marine Corps of the United States and deliver him into the custody of the naval authorities.

"SEC. 16. That the depositions of witnesses may be taken on reasonable notice to the opposite party, and when duly authenticated, may be put in evidence before naval courts, except in capital cases and cases where the punishment may be imprisonment or confinement for more than one year, as follows: First, depositions of civilian witnesses residing outside the State, Territory, or District in which a naval court is ordered to sit; second, depositions of persons in the naval or military service stationed or residing outside the State, Territory, or District in which a naval court is ordered to sit, or who are under orders to go outside of such State, Territory, or District; third, where such naval court is convened on board a vessel of the United States, or at a naval station not within any State, Territory, or District of the United States, the depositions of witnesses may be taken and used as herein provided whenever such witnesses reside or are stationed at such a distance from the place where said naval court is ordered to sit, or are about to go to such a distance as, in the judgment of the convening authority, would render it impracticable to secure their personal attendance.

"SEC. 17. That all sentences of summary courts-martial may be carried into effect upon the approval of the senior officer present, and all sentences of deck courts may be carried into effect upon approval of the convening authority or his successor in office.

"SEC. 18. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed."

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 26394) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. Only to ask the Senator whether he is willing now, as he has called for the reading of the bill, to let the bill be read, so that at least we may have that out of the way tonight? Does the Senator object to that?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, certainly not, Mr. President, and I would not insist upon that if it were not just with a view of getting time enough to examine this bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That will save time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like before the reading of the bill is proceeded with to say just a word or two.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. Before any further action is taken, as the Senator from Wisconsin stated that one of his reasons why this bill should go over was that a number of Senators were absent from the Chamber making speeches, I desire to suggest the lack of a quorum, so that we may ascertain the number of Senators who are present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I said "would be absent to-morrow," if that little correction will induce the Senator to withdraw his call for a quorum——

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the call proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Curtis	Heyburn	Penrose
Bailey	Daniel	Kean	Perkins
Bankhead	Depew	Kittredge	Piles
Beveridge	Dick	La Follette	Rayner
Brandegee	Dixon	McCreary	Richardson
Brown	Elkins	McCumber	Scott
Bulkeley	Flint	McEnery	Smith, Md.
Burkett	Foraker	McLaurin	Smoot
Burnham	Foster	Martin	Sutherland
Burrows	Frazier	Milton	Teller
Carter	Frye	Money	Tillman
Clapp	Fulton	Nelson	Warner
Clay	Gallinger	Newlands	Warren
Crane	Gamble	Overman	Wetmore
Culberson	Guggenheim	Owen
Cullom	Hale	Page
Cummins	Hemenway	Paynter

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I was very glad to yield to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE] to have the Senate pass the joint resolution making the 12th of February a legal holiday. Something more than a year ago I introduced exactly such a bill. It went to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It was reported out of that committee on the 24th day of March for indefinite postponement and, in my absence from the floor, was indefinitely postponed. So, sir, I was glad to see that some one is able to secure at the hands of the United States Senate, after many years, favorable consideration for a measure to make the birthday of Abraham Lincoln a legal holiday within the territory under the jurisdiction of the Congress.

Mr. President, I have not taken the floor for the purpose of consuming the time of the Senate or to delay legislation further than to secure for myself and possibly for other Senators who may wish to do so the opportunity to know what this legislation is to be before we are required to pass upon it.

I will consume no time to interfere with the reading of the bill to-day if, at the conclusion of its first reading, the bill may go over until Monday morning.

Mr. HALE. So far as I am concerned, in charge of the bill, as I have already intimated, I shall be entirely willing to leave it to the Senate whether the Senate, when it adjourns to-day, will adjourn until Monday. There would be nothing gained by attempting to hold a session with the lack of a quorum or a very thin quorum. I stated when the bill was made the business of the Senate that my hope was to pass it to-night, so that in view of the absence of many Senators we might adjourn until Monday.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin asks for time, which is a reasonable and proper thing, and in view of the further fact that it is evident we will probably not have a quorum to-morrow, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. The question is not debatable, Mr. President.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Let the reading of the bill be proceeded with, so that it will be disposed of.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no objection to interpose to the reading of the bill this evening——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Let the Chair understand. What is the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Wisconsin objected to dispensing with the formal reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. HALE. That makes the only thing in order the formal reading of the bill, not for amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct. The Secretary will proceed to read the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I realize that the reading of the bill in the Senate is not very helpful toward a better understanding of its provisions; and if the further consideration of the bill for the day can be deferred, I will withdraw my request for the first reading, allowing the record to be made, so that the first reading of the bill can not be demanded on Monday.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator does not insist on the formal reading of the bill, I will ask that the Clerk read the first clause of the bill, and after that it will be too late for anybody on Monday to ask for the formal reading. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered. Is there objection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With the understanding that we proceed no further to-night than the reading of the first clause of the bill, I do not interpose any objection.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not need to insist on an agreement. I stated that if the Senator did not insist on the formal reading, I would ask to dispense with it, and would then ask that one clause of the bill be read, so that nobody can make the point afterwards.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I so understood the Senator, and I made the statement I did because it occurred to me that it might be within the power of some other Senator to move to proceed with the consideration of the bill this afternoon. I had not in mind that it would be assumed by one Senator here to dispose of the proceedings out of hand. I was mindful that there were other Senators present who might feel free to exercise their rights and proceed with the consideration and passage of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HALE. Now let the Clerk read one clause of the bill, and then I will withdraw it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed to read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and continued to the end of line 8, on page 1.

Mr. HALE. I shall not under the circumstances ask any further procedure. The bill will come up, and I shall the first thing on Monday morning ask the Senate to proceed to its further consideration by amendments as they are reached.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be laid aside.

ENLARGED HOMESTEADS.

Mr. SMOOT submitted the following report (S. Doc. No. 712):

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 6155) to provide for an enlarged homestead having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 1.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to House amendments numbered 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to House amendment numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert:

"Provided, That no lands shall be subject to entry under the provisions of this act until such lands shall have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as not being, in his opinion, susceptible of successful irrigation at a reasonable cost from any known source of water supply."

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to amendment numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert:

SEC. 6. That whenever the Secretary of the Interior shall find that any tracts of land, in the State of Utah, subject to entry under this act, do not have upon them such a sufficient supply of water suitable for domestic purposes as would make continuous residence upon the lands possible, he may in his discretion designate such tracts of land, not to exceed in the aggregate two million acres, and thereafter they shall be subject to entry under this act without the necessity of residence: Provided, That in such event the entryman on any such entry shall in good faith cultivate not less than one-eighth of the entire area of the entry during the second year, one-fourth during the third year, and one-half during the fourth and fifth years after the date of such entry, and that after entry and until final proof the entryman shall reside within such distance of said land as will enable him successfully to farm the same as required by this section.

And that the House agree to the same.

REED SMOOT,
C. D. CLARK,
A. J. MCLAURIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
F. W. MONDELL,
A. J. VOLSTEAD,
JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that the report be printed and go over until Monday.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I have no objection whatever to that course, if the House is going to adjourn until Monday as well, but the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands of the House would like very much to have the report go over there just as soon as possible.

Mr. CARTER. It seems to be an important matter, and I should like very much to have it printed, in order that I may look it over before it is passed upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be printed and lie on the table.

BLAINE AND SUMAS, WASH.

Mr. PILES. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 24140) extending the provisions of the act of June 10, 1880, concerning transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CULBERSON. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

Mr. PILES. If the Senator from Texas will permit me, I can explain it in a minute.

A bill for this purpose passed the Senate. A similar bill was introduced in the House, and the House struck out a portion of the bill as it passed the Senate. Now, the Committee on Commerce have favorably reported the House bill with the amendment that was stricken out in the House. It is a local measure relating solely to a customs district on Puget Sound, in the State of Washington.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to insert at the end of the bill, as a new section, the following:

SEC. 2. That the deputy collectors of customs at the subports of Seattle and Tacoma, in the State of Washington, shall receive such compensation as the Secretary of the Treasury shall determine, not exceeding, however, the compensation paid the deputy collector at the port of San Francisco, Cal.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. PILES. I move that the House be requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 7862) to extend the privileges of the first section of the act of June 10, 1880, to the subports of Blaine and Sumas, in the State of Washington, and allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the compensation of the deputy collectors at Seattle and Tacoma.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-two minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. C. R. McKenney, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 247) relating to the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln and making the 12th day of February, 1909, a legal holiday, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

SALARY OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to a request which I am about to make. It is a matter which has had partial consideration here. In order that the bill may be before the House on Monday, suspension day, I ask unanimous consent to take from the calendar for consideration the bill reported from the Senator's committee this morning by the chairman, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 9295) in relation to the salary of the Secretary of State. The bill will be read by the Secretary for information.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on the Judiciary reported an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That section 4 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1907, fixing the annual compensation of heads of executive departments, be, and the same is hereby, repealed in so far as the same relates to the annual compensation of the Secretary of State; and the annual compensation of the Secretary of State shall be at the rate of $8,000.

SEC. 2. That on and after March 4, 1909, there shall be no emoluments attached to the office of Secretary of State other than those which by the law in force on the 1st day of May, 1904, belonged and were then attached to said office.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after March 4, 1909.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 15, 1909, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONSTITUTION ISLAND, HUDSON RIVER, NEW YORK.

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems that the papers relating to House joint resolution 219, in the course of transmission from the House to the Senate were lost, and it will be necessary for us to have a copy of the amendment to the resolution passed by the Senate, and I therefore offer the following order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Order 26.

Ordered, That the Clerk be directed to direct the Senate to furnish to the House a copy of Senate amendment to House joint resolution 219, accepting the gift of Constitution Island, in the Hudson River, New York, to replace the original copy of the amendment which has been lost.

The order was agreed to.

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Speaker, it will also be necessary to have a reengrossment of the resolution, and I offer the following order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Order 27.

Ordered, That House joint resolution 219, to accept the gift of Constitution Island, in the Hudson River, New York, be reengrossed.

The order was agreed to.

LAKE ERIE AND OHIO RIVER SHIP CANAL COMPANY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following Senate bill, a similar bill being upon the House Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 8154) to amend section 19 of the act granting the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal Company rights to construct, equip, maintain, and operate a canal or canals and appurtenant works between the Ohio River in the State of Pennsylvania and Lake Erie in the State of Ohio, approved June 30, 1906.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 19 of the act granting the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal Company rights to construct, equip, maintain, and operate a canal or canals and appurtenant works between the Ohio River in the State of Pennsylvania and Lake Erie in the State of Ohio, approved June 30, 1906, be, and it is hereby, amended as follows: In said section of said act strike out the words "three years" and insert the words "six years" in lieu thereof; also strike out the words "ten years" and insert the words "thirteen years" in lieu thereof.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman if this does anything more than to change the time?

Mr. DALZELL. It extends the time for beginning the canal and the time for completion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It does not change it at all in any other way?

Mr. DALZELL. Not at all; it does not change it in any other way whatever.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 24853) to amend the charter of the Lake Erie and Ohio Ship Canal Company, approved June 30, 1906, was laid on the table.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I call up conference report on the bill (H. R. 21052) to amend sections 11 and 13 of an act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States." I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read instead of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The House conferees recede from their disagreement to the Senate amendment and the Senate consents that the time within which petitioners are to pay the present rates is extended a year.

BENJ. F. HOWELL,
WILLIAM S. BENNET,
JOHN L. BURNETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Rule XXIX provides that there shall be a detailed statement with every report. I do not think this is a detailed statement inasmuch as it does not show in any way, shape, or form what the conferees did really agree to.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most detailed statements ever attached to a conference report.

Mr. MANN. Pending the decision upon the point of order, may I ask the gentleman what the effect of the bill is to be? This is in reference to the amount that the petitioners for naturalization are to pay?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes; after the 1st of July, 1909.

Mr. MANN. This increases the fees?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It does.

Mr. MANN. In order to pay the clerks more compensation?

Mr. BENNET of New York. No; not entirely.

Mr. MANN. What other excuse is there?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I should be glad to make a statement to the gentleman and the House.

The SPEAKER. Touching the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois, the Chair recollects the practice of the House, and has verified his recollection by an examination of the precedents, which are as follows:

It is for the House and not the Speaker to determine whether or not the detailed statement accompanying the conference report is sufficient to comply with the rules.

Again—

While the Chair may not pass upon the completeness of a written statement accompanying the conference report, he may require it to be in proper form.

It seems to the Chair that this is in proper form. Otherwise it is for the House, if it does not think it is complete enough and if the House desires, to have the conference report read in full. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SABATH. Then, let us have the conference report read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reading of the conference report?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 21052) entitled "An act to amend sections eleven and thirteen of an act entitled 'An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States,'" having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered five, and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

Page 5, line 7, strike out the comma after "thereunder."

Page 5, line 9, strike out the word "eight" and insert in lieu thereof the word "nine."

Page 5, line 6, strike out the word "eight" and insert in lieu thereof the word "nine."

And the Senate agree to the same.

BENJ. F. HOWELL,
WILLIAM S. BENNET,
JOHN L. BURNETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

WILLIAM P. DILLINGHAM,
BOIES PENROSE,
A. J. MCLAURIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I yield for a question.

Mr. MANN. This is to increase the fees that are to be paid by those seeking naturalization.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Perhaps I had better make a short statement.

Mr. MANN. I think it would be wise. This bill passed the House last session of Congress.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes. Under the act of June 29, 1906, the expense of naturalization over the entire country to the individual applicant was decreased, although in the large cities it was, I should say, increased, but the fees were made uniform. There is a provision in the bill, section 13, which limits the amount of money that the clerk of any court can expend in a large office which takes in over $6,000 a year to $3,000 a year, and under the construction of the Comptroller of the Currency there was no way that additional clerical assistance could be obtained.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Right there, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield. Does that apply to clerks of the district courts in the States where naturalization laws are in force?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It applies to the clerk of any court exercising jurisdiction in naturalization, both federal and state.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does the gentleman think that we have a right here to limit the fees that are paid to a clerk of the district court in the States.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Oh, yes. Congress having the power to pass a uniform naturalization law, there is no doubt about that. The Comptroller of the Currency so construed the law that there was no way of obtaining a larger clerical force in the large cities, those being the only places where the fees were taken in in excess of $6,000 a year, so we passed an amendment in the last session remedying that by permitting the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to base his estimate for clerical assistance upon the amount of work that was being done in a court.

That remedied the city situation. When we got to the Senate, the Senators representing States in which there was not only city territory, but rural territory as well, had this condition, that the clerks of the courts all through the country in the rural courts said their fees had been decreased and that they would not naturalize at all unless the fees were increased. There is no way, of course, that we can force any court in the country, except the federal courts, to naturalize. Therefore the Senate insisted both in and out of conference that the fees should be increased to what they practically had been prior to the passage of the law. It is not large—a total of $10, spread over three years, for American citizenship. It is a smaller price than the naturalization fee of any other country, so far as I am advised. That amendment was inserted in the Senate, and the House conferees were unable to obtain any concession except that the new rate should not go into effect until the 1st of July, 1909. The rate is not unfair. Particularly it is not unfair in country districts, where the clerk is compelled really to act as the attorney for the applicant. The Senate has agreed to the provision of the House remedying conditions in cities, and the House conferees have agreed to that portion of the bill adopted by the Senate which is asked for by the clerks of the courts and by applicants for naturalization in the country districts.

Mr. MANN. What are the present fees paid by petitioners for naturalization?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The present fees amount to $5; $1 on the declaration of intention, $2 on filing the petition, and $2 for the final order.

Mr. MANN. What will be the fees if this bill becomes a law?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Four dollars at the filing of the declaration of intention, $3 on filing the petition, and $3 upon the entry of the final order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman proposes to increase the naturalization fees from $5 to $10.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The increase to $5 was an increase all over the country, was it not?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It was not.

Mr. MANN. How much of an increase was it in the gentleman's city?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Practically no increase at all.

Mr. MANN. It was an increase of 500 per cent in my city, and I think quite generally.

Mr. BENNET of New York. If the gentleman will allow me to answer his question, in my city of New York it was no increase at all, because the clerks of the court had this perquisite. They used to give the applicant the kind of a certificate that he wanted and charge from $3 to as high as $15 for different kinds of certificates, so that there was practically no increase.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman state that in New York, before this bill passed providing for the increase, that it cost an applicant for naturalization $5, which he paid for clerk's fees?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It did not necessarily do so.

Mr. MANN. How much did it necessarily cost him then?

Mr. BENNET of New York. In the federal courts, where the bulk of the naturalization was done, if the applicant was content to take the kind of a certificate that was given to him, it cost him about $2.65, if I recollect.

Mr. MANN. What did it cost in the state courts, where the bulk of the naturalization has always been done?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will disagree with the gentleman as to that. The bulk has always been done in the federal courts. It costs about $2 in the state courts.

Mr. MANN. That was an increase from $2 to $5. Now, the gentleman proposes to increase from $5 to $10. If the clerks could do it before for $2, why can not they do it now for $5?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will say to the gentleman that so far as that particular portion of the bill is concerned, he and I, both coming from large cities, know that in the federal courts in our cities the clerks would have to do the work as fast as they could.

Mr. MANN. I may say to the gentleman that there is no naturalization in the federal courts of Chicago worth mentioning.

Mr. BENNET of New York. There has been in the federal courts of New York.

Mr. MANN. No wonder you want another judge over there. You will never get another judge for that purpose.

Mr. BENNET of New York. But I will say to the gentleman, not in a spirit of criticism, that the gentleman will doubtless recall that Congress had to pass a bill to legalize the kind of naturalization that they did in the city courts of Chicago, and that the gentleman from Illinois was the man who introduced the bill.

Mr. MANN. That was the kind of naturalization, not a specific court to naturalize; and we have plenty of courts to perform the work of naturalization in accordance with the law, and if there is any cry, either on the part of the clerks or those seeking naturalization, to double the cost of naturalization, I have not yet discovered it.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes; the gentleman and myself are both proud of the cities which we represent in part, but we must not arrogate to ourselves the idea that we represent the whole of the United States. The rural class of this country have as much right to ask it as the big cities.

Mr. MANN. I notice that the demand for this bill comes from New York City and New York City alone.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Not at all.

Mr. SABATH. No; there is one more district——

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will yield to my colleague from New York [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman inform me whether, if this bill becomes a law, the clerks of courts in New York will still be able to charge perquisites in addition to these fees and thereby pro tanto increase the cost more than $10 to the alien desiring to become a citizen?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I am very glad to be able to inform my colleague that clerks in the courts in our cities have not been able to charge anything for perquisites of that character since the 29th of June, 1906, and I will say that if this bill goes into effect, Mr. Alexander, clerk of the district court; Mr. Kidds, clerk of the circuit court; and Mr. Dooling, clerk of the supreme court, can, under a part of the bill—it is a double-sided bill—be able to secure the clerical assistance they need, so that his prospective constituents and my prospective constituents will not have to go four, five, or six times in order to be naturalized.

Mr. HARRISON. I am simply interested to keep down the cost to the alien desiring to become a citizen of this country.

Mr. BENNET of New York. This really does do that because they can now only naturalize 40 or more a day because they have not the clerical force, and if we pass this bill, it does do it. I now yield to my colleague on the committee—I will first yield to the gentleman from North Dakota for a question.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, as one coming from an agricultural or rural district I want to say I have never heard of any complaint by the clerks on account of the amount that is now being charged. Now, I want to say further that the naturalization is being done in the district courts by the district judges and not by the federal judges.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will answer the gentleman by saying that in various States—for instance, the whole State of Vermont—there is not an equivalent of your district court that naturalizes a single alien, because the clerks will not do the business; and that, so far as they can, the business is driven into the federal courts, where they have to do it to the great inconvenience and loss of time and money of the alien.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; but the increase is an unreasonable one.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Five dollars, spread over three years.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I take it that the tendency of Congress should be to make naturalization easy and not more difficult, for this reason, that it is desirable from every standpoint to identify the newcomer as soon as possible with our political institutions. Therefore we should make it as easy as possible to enable him to so identify himself. This increases the fee by 100 per cent, and for that reason I should be opposed to this legislation. And allow me to say that $10 may not be a large amount for us; but for the immigrant who desires to become a citizen and is proud of the fact that he wants to become a citizen, it may be a very large amount of money.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I quite agree with the gentleman's views.

Mr. CAMPBELL. You say you have taken the country into consideration quite as much in the preparation of this bill as the cities?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will state for the gentleman's information that in my State federal courts took no action whatever on the admission of an alien until the passage of the bill here two years ago. Prior to that time it cost the alien anywhere from $2 to $3 to become a citizen of the United States. Under the provisions of this bill, as it appears here, it will cost him at least $10. Now, in what way are you providing for the country in this bill?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Because every clerk of a state court, realizing that he is not getting adequate pay for this work, drives the work into the federal court, as the gentleman from Kansas apparently says has resulted in his own State. Therefore you are discommoding the alien who goes out to work on a farm and who wants to be naturalized. It is a harder thing for him than it is for the man in my district who pays a nickel and goes on the elevated railroad. You send him to your federal court, when he ought to be naturalized in his county or district court, as the case may be.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will say they do not go to the federal courts now in Kansas, unless they are taken there by a representative of the Bureau of Immigration from Washington.

Mr. MANN. The federal courts want the work now because it is profitable.

Mr. CAMPBELL. And they are taken there by these representatives of the Bureau of Immigration.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will say that there is no representative of the Bureau of Immigration that has any authority whatever to take an alien anywhere to naturalize him.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The appropriation under which they were able to do that was not included in the last appropriation bill, and that is the reason they are not doing it to-day.

Mr. BENNET of New York. There never has been such an appropriation.

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] for five minutes.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this bill is one in the interest of a few court clerks, and not, as has been stated, in the interest of the honest alien who is trying to become a citizen. The last Congress passed a naturalization law which increased the naturalization fees up to $5. Formerly, in each and every state court that I knew of, the fees were from 50 cents to $1. But the act of 1906 increased it to $5. Now, it is intended by this bill to increase it 100 per cent, namely, from $5 to $10. The statement has been made that some of the clerks are refusing to issue the certificates. I have investigated this matter, and I have ascertained that there are only two clerks in the United States that have refused to issue these certificates.

The courts in the city of Chicago issue as many naturalization papers as any other courts in the United States, and the clerks of the federal and state courts even advertise the fact that applicants can obtain papers in their respective courts. This does not indicate that the fees are not large enough, does it?

The fees for this work, which comprises the recording of naturalizations, filling out two blanks like these [exhibiting], and the final certificate, besides the answering of a few questions in the usual gruff manner, are $5, of which sum the clerks receive one-half, and the other half of said sum goes to the naturalization fund.

The Chief of the Division of Naturalization, in his last annual report, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, on page 22 thereof, says the following:

> It is for Congress to determine whether such costs should be borne, in whole or in part, by the persons seeking citizenship or by the Public Treasury, and in some cases by the States.

Turning to page 24, under the heading "Financial," the report shows that for the same period, the income which the Government received from naturalization fees, amounted to $166,635, and that the total expenditures of the Division of Naturalization for said period amounted to $39,728.05, enriching the Treasury of the United States by $126,906.95. These figures surely do not justify his statement, nor do they indicate that the increase of fees is necessary, and therefore his statement as well as the proposition itself is all the more preposterous.

As it is now, these clerks are receiving enormous salaries and fees; and the mere fact that a few of these clerks, in districts where extreme bigotry is exemplified by intense prejudice toward foreigners, refuse to issue certificates of naturalization, in brazen defiance of the law and violating their oath of office, thereby trying to influence this increase of fees mainly for the purpose of enriching themselves, certainly does not warrant the increase which is provided in this bill. [Applause.]

The motive for the increase is selfish and is sought to be obtained at the expense of thousands of honest, law-abiding, and industrious people, who have come to this country believing that the principle of democracy—"Equal rights to all and special privileges to none"—is still alive, and that the natural right of freedom and liberty will not be denied to them. These thousands of sincere and liberty-loving people, who are the tillers of the soil, the workers in the factories, shops, and mines, who develop the vast natural resources of this country, productive of untold wealth, are a material factor in placing our country in a leading position over all other countries. It is these people who make it possible for us to produce and manufacture at prices which enable us to compete with the entire world and thus increase our commerce.

These people should not be told that their presence in this country is merely suffered for their labor, but we should give them every encouragement and inducement, so that they may avail themselves of the right of citizenship, which they are so desirous and anxious to obtain; for I am satisfied that they do appreciate this great privilege and honor, and prize it as it should be prized, above everything else; and I hope that you gentlemen here will not be in favor of the proposition that our Government should go as far as to make a profit out of issuing citizens' certificates. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have investigated this matter thoroughly, and I am satisfied that the increase that has been allowed the clerks in the first portion of this bill should satisfy anyone, for it increases the allowance to the clerks from $3,000 to $6,000. This is a joint bill, and the first part of the bill gives the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the right to allow the clerks one-half of $6,000, where formerly they were allowed only 50 per cent of $3,000; in this way their increase amounts to 100 per cent, and it gives them the right to secure additional help, so that they could and naturally would find a way to spend the 50 per cent which the Government is now receiving. I am positive that they will not let this fine opportunity go by to secure a few additional jobs for their "faithful."

There is no demand from any source, unless it be from these few clerks who are trying to enrich themselves at the expense of these poor unfortunate aliens who desire to become citizens of this country. [Applause.]

I regret that the conferees on the part of the House should have seen fit to yield to every point urged by the Senate conferees. To increase the naturalization fees places so sacred a matter as citizenship on the plane of a purchasable commodity, and it imposes additional hardship on deserving people who desire to become naturalized. I can not comprehend the motive of the committee, when the Fifty-ninth Congress, after a thorough investigation, extending over a period of several months, finally agreed that the naturalization fees should be $5. It was then the opinion of many that the fee was high; but now, without any good reason, efforts are being made to increase the fee 100 per cent.

I say, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, it should be our aim to assist these men to become citizens, for the sooner they become citizens the better it is for the country and the better men they become. [Applause.] We should not put anything in their way to obstruct their honest efforts to become citizens. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Does the gentleman desire more time? I will give the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. SABATH. But what attitude are we taking? An attempt was made only a few days ago to pass a bill that would inflict cruel and inhuman punishment by deportation of all aliens guilty of an offense which, regardless of its gravity, is punishable by the codes of some of the States by one year's imprisonment, the deportation to be carried out after the sentence has been served out. And now, notwithstanding the fact that such bill is still pending, this bill proposing to increase the naturalization fees is sought to be forced through this House, thereby placing more and greater restrictions in the way of aliens. First, you try to pass a law making it almost impossible for an alien to become a citizen, and after you pass such a law then you say to him, because you are not a citizen you must pay double for any offense or any error or mistake you may be guilty of, for you are not a citizen, and though you have served your term and paid the legal penalty you must be deported to the country from whence you came. I was opposed to this legislation, and I am opposed to it now; and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will not pass. I hope that the report of the conference committee will not be approved, because, in my judgment, it is not such legislation as we should pass. We should be just; we should be fair; we should do by these people the same as we would ask should be done by us if we were placed in a like position. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOUTELL). Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when we passed the naturalization act a few years ago it was urged that the fees ought to be increased—that they were not then sufficient. Prior to that time the fees generally in the country amounted from 50 cents to $2 for naturalization. By that law they were increased to $5; and the fees of the clerks are paid out of the fees paid by the applicants.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having increased the fees from one to two dollars for issuing naturalization papers up to $5 as now provided by law, this bill proposes to increase the fees for each person applying for naturalization from $5 to $10, an increase of 100 per cent. In whose interest, pray? In the interest of a few clerks. So far as I know the only ones who have asked it were the clerks in New York City. Prior to the passage of the last law which increased the fees, the work of naturalization was performed in the state courts almost invariably. Since the law passed increasing the fees for clerks up to $5 the federal court clerks have gone out and urged business to come into the federal courts. They wanted to get the fees. It was profitable work for them. It was that much more money in their pockets, and having tasted the meat they wanted more of it. [Laughter.]

Having obtained a part of this work, they now seek to double the fees upon the petitioners.

Mr. ROBERTS. The gentleman does not blame them for that, does he?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not blame the clerks, as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, for making the request; but I should blame myself very much for granting the request. The fees are enough now. The work of the clerks in naturalization is all performed by filling in printed blanks. There is no work except to fill out a few blanks. There is not a clerk in the United States, notwithstanding the gentleman's claim, who is not anxious to obtain this work at the present fees.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a brief statement?

Mr. MANN. I always yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET of New York. If this bill becomes a law, there is not a clerk in the city of New York who will get one additional penny, because he is limited by law to one-half of $6,000 now, and every one of them takes in more than $6,000. So it will not increase the fees of the clerks in New York City, or in Chicago either.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is very strange, then, that the gentleman himself has had two or three bills on the calendar, and still has two more bills on the calendar, to pay money to the clerks in New York, on the ground that under the existing law they have not been able to get fees enough.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman from Illinois is quite in error. The gentleman from New York has no bills at all on the calendar for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. I have not the time to pull them out now, or I would do it.

Mr. BENNET of New York. It would take the gentleman quite a while.

Mr. MANN. No; it would not. I have them right in my desk now.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Put them in the RECORD, then; any such bills introduced by me.

Mr. MANN. Introduced or reported by the gentleman?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Either one.

Mr. MANN. Very well; I will fight that out with the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET of New York. All right.

Mr. MANN. Now, there is no excuse for doubling these fees. It is enough for the applicant for naturalization to pay $5. And when you have required those already naturalized to pay $5 for the clerk's fees, how can we justify ourselves to those people who come next year to be naturalized and who ask, "Why is it that we have to pay $10 to be naturalized when our neighbor only had to pay $5 last year?" For whose benefit? For a few clerks.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, in order to see whether this bill has merit, it is a very good idea to take a little notice of what the clerks have to do in the naturalization of aliens. Gentlemen say this bill is in the interest of a few clerks in the large cities. As has been stated, the clerks in the very large cities, under the limitation of law, will not get a cent out of the bill. They will get their maximum even if the increase is not made. Now, all over the country—I know in my own town the clerk has called my attention to it; he has said he is going to get out of the business of naturalizing aliens, because half of the fees go to the department, and what is left does not pay him for looking after it. Gentlemen forget that half of this $5 which the clerk gets in naturalization cases is returned in thirty days to the bureau, so that the clerk gets only $2.50 out of it. The result of it is, Mr. Speaker, if the clerks in the smaller cities of the country refuse to make out the papers, if the state courts refuse to take action, the alien desiring to be naturalized is forced to go 40, 60, or 100 miles to where there is a federal court whose duty it is to naturalize him. It is a mere matter of grace as to whether the state court will grant this naturalization or not. The Federal Government and Congress have no right to force a state court or a state clerk to grant naturalization or to fill out these papers. Hence, if they are not forced to do that—and we can not force them—the result is that when the clerks of the state court refuse to make out the papers the judges will refuse to grant the naturalizations.

The result will be increased expense and inconvenience to the alien in the rural districts, for he will be put to the trouble and expense of going to the larger cities, where federal courts are held. Gentlemen are mistaken when they say that the clerks in the country districts have not desired the passage of this bill. I have heard from Members of Congress on this floor, I have heard from many of the clerks of my state courts, where naturalization is being done, and they do not desire to continue this work unless the fees are increased.

In order, as I said, to see something about what the clerks have to do, let me read one or two sections of the act as it now stands.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that the courts can compel the clerks to issue the certificates?

Mr. BURNETT. State courts?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. I should think not. If the clerk comes to the court and says that the compensation is incommensurate with the work he has to do, the judge would not compel him to do it. If the clerk should refuse to do it, there would have to be some process in the nature of a mandamus to compel him to do it, and I do not think that the court would have the authority to do any such thing. The state laws do not require him to do it, and certainly no state court would have the authority to force him to do it.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that with the exception of six clerks, all the others have issued these certificates or these naturalization papers?

Mr. BURNETT. Probably so.

Mr. SABATH. And there have only been objections from three of them?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not know how many have refused, but the clerk of the court in my town said that he intended to cut it out. Many clerks of state courts return the blanks and refuse to have anything to do with it. When the clerk of the city court of my town was talking to me about refusing to transact the business, I persuaded him to hold on and see if Congress would not give some relief, and if Congress refuses to grant the relief by increasing the fees, I would not blame any clerk for refusing to do it. Instead of being against the convenience of the aliens, it is really in favor of his convenience at places where they have no federal courts.

Now, let me read what the clerks have to do. Section 9 says, in referring to petitions for naturalization:

SEC. 9. That every final hearing upon such petition shall be had in open court before a judge or judges thereof, and every final order which may be made upon such petition shall be under the hand of the court and entered in full upon a record kept for that purpose, and upon such final hearing of such petition the applicant and witnesses shall be examined under oath before the court and in the presence of the court.

There is the order that the clerk has to enter. Then section 12 provides:

SEC. 12. That it is hereby made the duty of the clerk of each and every court exercising jurisdiction in naturalization matters under the provisions of this act to keep and file a duplicate of each declaration of intention made before him and to send to the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization at Washington, within thirty days after the issuance of a certificate of citizenship, a duplicate of such certificate, and to make and keep on file in his office a stub for each certificate so issued by him, whereon shall be entered a memorandum of all the essential facts set forth in such certificate.

Now, you see, he has to make and file that duplicate; he has to send it to the Bureau of Immigration at Washington within thirty days. It further provides:

It shall also be the duty of the clerk of each of said courts to report to the said bureau, within thirty days after the final hearing and decision of the court, the name of each and every alien who shall be denied naturalization, and to furnish to said bureau duplicates of all petitions within thirty days after the filing of the same, and certified copies of such other proceedings and orders instituted in or issued out of said court affecting or relating to the naturalization of aliens as may be required from time to time by the said bureau.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BOUTELL). The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BURNETT. Now, these are only a part of the things that the clerks have to do.

This section further provides:

Clerks of courts having and exercising jurisdiction in naturalization matters shall be responsible for all blank certificates of citizenship received by them from time to time from the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and shall account for the same to the said bureau whenever required so to do by such bureau. No certificate of citizenship received by any such clerk which may be defaced or injured in such manner as to prevent its use as herein provided shall in any case be destroyed, but such certificate shall be returned to the said bureau; and in case any such clerk shall fail to return or properly account for any certificate furnished by the said bureau, as herein provided, he shall be liable to the United States in the sum of $50, to be recovered in an action of debt, for each and every certificate not properly accounted for or returned.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. I will for a question.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The gentleman states that half of this fee of $5 goes back to the bureau. Is there any demand on the part of the bureau for this increase?

Mr. BURNETT. That is not before us now. If you want to repeal that part of it——

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Why should we, because the clerk only gets $2.50, inflict upon the applicant a payment of $5 additional?

Mr. BURNETT. It is not an infliction upon the applicant. It may be in great cities where they have the federal courts; but for the applicants in the remote districts, it is a convenience and a saving of expense, because, for instance, it would cost him more than that to go from my town 60 miles and pay his expenses in order to get to a federal court, where they could naturalize him. Even in the larger cities, for want of sufficient clerical force, the applicant has to return sometimes three or four times.

Now I will read a little further:

The clerk of any court collecting such fees is hereby authorized to retain one-half of the fees collected by him in such naturalization proceeding; the remaining one-half of the naturalization fees in each case collected by such clerks, respectively, shall be accounted for in their quarterly accounts, which they are hereby required to render the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and paid over to such bureau within thirty days from the close of each quarter in each and every fiscal year, and the moneys so received shall be paid over to the disbursing clerk of the Department of Commerce and Labor, who shall thereupon deposit them in the Treasury of the United States, rendering an account therefor quarterly to the Auditor for the State and other Departments, and the said disbursing clerk shall be held responsible under his bond for said fees so received.

The Chief of the Bureau of Naturalization has stated to me time and again that he was receiving complaints from clerks of the smaller districts where they have no federal courts continuously, and unless some relief is granted, you people who shed so many tears for the alien, instead of benefiting him by keeping down the fees, are going to impose upon him additional hardships by forcing him to go to cities remote from where he lives in order to become naturalized, and in the large cities force him often to lose much time and expense in accomplishing his desire.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that the Secretary has given out in his report only one clerk that has actually refused to do this work at this price?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not care whether he has or not.

Mr. SABATH. And now because this one man refuses, does the gentleman believe——

Mr. BURNETT. I hope the gentleman will ask his question and then stand on it, and not argue the matter in my time. As a matter of fact, the Chief of the Bureau of Naturalization, in his report, states that many of the state courts have not yet applied for the forms used for naturalization and some have returned those sent, sometimes derisively referring to the meagerness of the fees as the reason for this return.

Mr. SABATH. Well, that was my question.

Mr. BURNETT. It does not matter if there had been one clerk or more who had refused to do it. If it is an injustice to the clerks in the rural districts, it ought to be amended by Congress; and to say that an alien coming here and wanting to become an American citizen, a man over 21 years of age, will not or can not give $10 for the purpose of having that privilege, carrying with it all of the privileges of American citizenship——

Mr. SABATH. To enrich a few clerks.

Mr. BURNETT. Is to say that he is not the kind of a man who ought to be an American citizen. What does he gain? The very protection of the American flag ought to be worth more than that to any alien who is inspired by patriotic motives to become an American citizen.

A thousand privileges does he gain by having that little certificate of citizenship. On the high seas it protects him, and if he wanders in foreign lands, he may know that the whole American Army and Navy is behind him to protect him in the rights conferred upon him by that certificate. Thousands of aliens have become naturalized citizens here and then returned to their homes and to-day are enjoying the protection of the American flag while they are domiciled thousands of miles from our shores.

There is scarcely any country in the world where citizenship comes as cheaply as in America, and none where its privileges are so great. Your son and mine, born beneath the flag, must stay here twenty-one years before they can enjoy the full privileges of citizenship, and yet the people's Representatives in this House treat citizenship so lightly that they think it comes too high at the niggardly sum of $10 for those who come from other lands.

Mr. BENNET of New York. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Nineteen minutes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I yield a minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a moment ago I stated that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] had two bills pending on the calendar. I desire to apologize to the Member from New York. He neither introduced the bills, nor did he report them. There are two bills pending on the calendar, one introduced by his colleague, the gentleman from New York, and another introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], both reported from the gentleman's committee. I was in error in supposing that the gentleman himself introduced a bill for the relief of the clerks in the cities.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is usually so correct that this one mistake clearly accentuates his usual accuracy in other regards. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE].

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, the home county of my district is made up quite largely of people of foreign birth. Perhaps two-fifths of the voters of the city of Galesburg, Ill., are men who have come from Norway or Sweden, more largely from Sweden. They are splendid people, and have made good naturalized citizens of this country. They have served this country in war and in peace, and I am loath to cast my vote in any way that will make it a hardship upon any of their relatives that come to this country in order to be citizens of the United States. In my home county, at the county seat, in our circuit court, is where these men come to be naturalized. I heard complaint when the fees were increased from about $2 to $5. I know that I would hear greater complaint if I voted to increase the fees to $10. Now, it is stated that the clerks should have $5 of the $10 and $5 of the $10 should go to the Bureau of Immigration.

I wish to say to the gentlemen of this House that there is not a clerk in my congressional district who would refuse to issue naturalization papers to a proposed applicant if he came there for the purpose of receiving his papers. The clerks are elected by the people outside of, perhaps, a few of the largest cities where they may or may not be appointed. Here are three hundred and ninety-odd congressional districts. Almost every clerk that is in these congressional districts is elected by the electors as we are elected to Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I yield one more minute to the gentleman.

Mr. PRINCE. Now, to give these clerks additional pay at the expense of the voter or proposed voter is a hardship upon the proposed electors, and is a gift to the clerk, and when you resolve it down to its final analysis, this bill ought to be regarded as a bill to increase the clerk's fees for the benefit of the clerk and against the interest of the proposed voter who desires to become a citizen of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], a member of the committee.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I can not believe that gentlemen who oppose the amendment of the Senate understand the situation. This is not an amendment the sole purpose of which is to increase the salary of the clerks of the courts. It has two purposes—one to facilitate the administration of the naturalization laws and the other is in the interest of the applicant himself. The gentlemen who have discussed the matter do not understand the amount of work that must be done by the clerk in administering the present naturalization law. The fees now charged are not sufficient to induce the clerks to do the work, and as a result many state courts have refused to take jurisdiction in naturalization cases, and so the naturalization of aliens at this time is conducted largely by the United States courts. The result of this is to clog the calendars of the United States courts. The applicant must therefore come not once with two witnesses to be naturalized, oftentimes making a long trip to the United States court for that purpose, but he must come two, three, and sometimes four times to the court before his case can be heard. Instead of its costing him an additional $5, in many cases it costs him $10, $15, $20, or even more in loss of time and expenses. I know that this is the case in all of the large cities, and I have no doubt that it is general all over the country. The purpose of this amendment is to increase the pay of the clerks sufficient to make it an inducement to the clerks of the state courts to do the work, and thus make it easy for the applicant for naturalization to secure a certificate of naturalization, while now it is difficult.

Now, if we increase the cost of naturalization, as the Senate amendment proposes, we shall still have the cheapest naturalization in the world. There is no nation in the world which naturalizes a citizen for the cost of $10. In the cheapest country the cost is at least $30 or $40. Gentlemen should remember that only one half the fees collected are retained by the clerk; the other half goes to the Bureau of Naturalization to pay the expenses of administering the law. I understand that the bureau is now greatly hampered for funds.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Has the gentleman seen the report that the department has issued, in which they say they have made clear of expenses a profit for the last fiscal year of $126,907?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I would like to answer the gentleman by saying that that report does not include $150,000 that was paid under the sundry civil appropriation bill out of the immigration fund.

Mr. SABATH. For what?

Mr. BENNET of New York. For attorneys and things necessary to carry on the law. The gentleman should read the report.

Mr. SABATH. I did; and it shows the department received $166,635 and paid out only $39,729, leaving a net profit of $126,907.

Mr. BENNET of New York. That does not include——

Mr. HAYES. As my colleague suggested, the gentleman has not included the $150,000 appropriated by this House.

Mr. MANN. Neither did the department.

Mr. SABATH. For what?

Mr. HAYES. To administer the naturalization law.

Mr. BENNET of New York. And paid out of the Department of Justice——

Mr. SABATH. For what purpose?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, it seems from the statement of the gentleman from New York that the clerks in the state courts of New York are not sufficiently patriotic to do the work of naturalization when people call upon them for that purpose. The state courts of Illinois are always ready to naturalize any citizen who applies and is entitled to naturalization. They are glad to do the work and they will keep the courts open all night for that purpose if it be necessary. The increase from $5 to $10 proposed to be made under this bill is unjust, unfair, and excessive, and the bill ought not under any circumstances to be enacted into law. [Applause.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have read at the desk in my time a quotation from the report of the division of naturalization which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Not now.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The next most important recommendation is that the fees be increased so as at once to pay the clerks of courts adequate compensation for their labor and responsibility and to make the service rendered by the Government self-supporting as near as may be. It has already been pointed out that such a measure would distribute the work of naturalization more evenly among the courts and enable them to bestow more time on the hearings with justice to their other business than they are willing to give under existing conditions. The extra cost to the petitioners would be more than repaid by the results to them of speedy disposal of their petitions and relief from the expense in providing for themselves and their witnesses during the time their cases are delayed. To those residing in the large cities a still greater relief would be afforded, as they would not have to return again and again, as at present necessitated, and in some courts as often as five times, to get the opportunity to file their papers, because present fees are not sufficient to enable the clerks of the courts in such cities to employ deputies enough to dispatch their business promptly.

In few countries are the charges for naturalization even approximately so small as in the United States. The cost of the proceedings are of necessity considerable. It is for Congress to determine whether such costs should be borne, in whole or in part, by the persons seeking citizenship or by the Public Treasury and, in some cases, by the States.

On April 30 last the division received the following notice:

"The clerk at Montpelier will not take any naturalization business after Saturday next, because he says it costs the State about $100 a day to hold court, and that each case in his court is charged $14, and that unless he can collect $14 from the Government for every naturalization case the court will not do the business."

Many of the state courts have not yet applied for the forms, and some have returned those sent, sometimes derisively referring to the meagerness of the fees as the reason for this return.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be notified when I have but one minute remaining.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Not at present. Mr. Speaker, this is a report of a conference committee, after full and free conference between the conferees appointed by the two Houses. The result of this report, if agreed to and if the bill becomes a law, will be to facilitate the naturalization of the alien who is entitled to naturalization. In every respect the law of June 29, 1906, enacted to wipe out naturalization frauds, has been a success, except that in the matter of fees, the fee being fixed at $5, it has worked badly against the qualified alien both in the city and in the country.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I have only two or three minutes, and I will probably explain what the gentleman desires. In a decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury it has been so construed that an office, no matter how large it is, can receive only $3,000 a year for clerical assistance, and the result is that in the large cities, not only in New York but Boston, San Francisco, and even Chicago, men have to come down four, five, and six times and not only lose their own day's time, but lose the time of their two witnesses——

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Why are they required to go down so often?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will tell the gentleman: Because it is a physical impossibility, under the present law, to fill out the petitions of more than 40 or 50 men a day; and sometimes as many as 200 apply.

Mr. MANN. That does not apply anywhere except in the big cities. The gentleman said this would not apply to the big cities.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The increase of fees, I said, would not, the fee being simply in the country districts or state courts, which are not required to naturalize and do not get the blanks in as many cases as they might.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to know whether the statement of the gentleman applies generally to country courts? I have never known in the West any state courts to refuse to naturalize applicants, and they do it every day.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The report of the Division of Naturalization says that this condition is country wide, and if this law is passed many more courts have already signified their intention of not taking the blanks.

Mr. MARTIN. Evidently the investigations of the Division of Naturalization have not been country wide. Ever since the courts were established in my State the aliens have been freely naturalized by giving a common fee of a dollar or a dollar and a half, and never do the courts refuse to naturalize whoever applies, provided they are entitled to become citizens.

Mr. SABATH. Only one clerk has refused.

Mr. MARTIN. How many naturalizations can a clerk perform in a day?

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. Is the machinery self-sustaining?

Mr. BENNET of New York. One clerk, with the assistance allowed him by the law, can not possibly naturalize more than fifty. In a country district a man gets no such amount, and it ought to be borne in mind by the House that the clerk does not get this entire increase. The clerk gets one-half; and to-day, with the fee as it is, the service is not self-sustaining. Now, I am as good a friend of the alien——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman says the service is not self-sustaining?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I do.

Mr. TAWNEY. To what service does the gentleman now refer?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I refer to the administrative service.

Mr. TAWNEY. Of the naturalization law alone, or of the immigration service as well?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I refer to the naturalization law alone, in which there is a deficit of about $70,000 a year.

Mr. MANN. Although the gentleman was very strongly of the opinion when we passed the bill that there would be no deficit and that it would be self-supporting. I mean the men who were favoring the bill——

Mr. BENNET of New York. I favored the bill.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Expressly informed the House that it would be self-sustaining.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I said frankly to the House that we were not sure of that.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, at the time the bill was reported to the House the committee reported in favor of an $11 naturalization fee. At the earnest solicitation of many Members of the House the amount was reduced to $5. The committee at that time stated that the purpose was simply to make the law self-sustaining. We doubted whether $5 would accomplish that purpose, but we submitted to the reduction to $5 rather under protest and to try it as an experiment. I state this, not intending to speak upon the bill, because in all particulars I am not in favor of it as the conference committee has reported it, but it is not correct to say that the committee in reporting the bill said that $5 would make the law self-supporting.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I started to say that the aliens had no better friend than I, as I think I have demonstrated in the past. I am in favor of a rather liberal immigration, and I have voted for such. But I do think that when a man has come to us from a foreign country and has been here five years——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has sixty seconds remaining.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will take twenty seconds to say this: That he ought to be willing to pay $10, spread over five years, for the benefits of American citizenship.

Now, I move the previous question upon the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken, and the Chair annuounced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. SABATH. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 50.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in doubt.

The House divided; and there were ayes 63, noes 84.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Seventeen gentlemen have risen; not a sufficient number; the yeas and nays are refused; and the House disagrees to the conference report.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is not the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] entitled to recognition?

The SPEAKER. It would seem to the Chair not. The matter is disposed of, as the bill now stands. If no further step is taken, the bill is gone, and the gentleman in charge of the bill, it seems to the Chair, if recognized, does not controvert it, because it is complete.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment and ask a further conference.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I raise a point of order on that. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] desires to make that motion. The gentleman from New York had moved to agree to the conference report, and by not succeeding he lost the right to be recognized.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will understand that a motion that brings the two bodies together takes precedence of a motion to insist upon its disagreement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman had made that motion.

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman had not made the motion, as far as the Chair is aware. The gentleman can make the motion now if he desires.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MANN. I rise to take the floor, if I can.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from New York has the floor on a motion that the House do further insist upon its disagreement.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman had not moved the previous question.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York had not yielded the floor, and moves the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was not ordered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill and conference report be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the conference report, which would carry the bill, lie on the table.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, the gentleman from New York states that there are other matters in the bill that are of importance, and that he will take the vote of the House as an instruction when the matter goes to conference, and therefore I ask leave to withdraw the motion to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. When a gentleman in charge of a report of conferees comes before the House and the House refuses to sustain the report, does he not lose control of the bill?

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair, he does not. Ordinarily that is the case. The House has rejected the conference report; that disposes of it.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Of that part.

The SPEAKER. It is rejected. It is now for the House to take such further action as it may desire, or no action, if no action is desired——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that further consideration of this matter be postponed until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that further consideration of this matter be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. BENNET of New York. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BENNET of New York. In what situation would that leave the matter?

The SPEAKER. It would dispose of the matter until to-morrow.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Would it come up immediately after reading the Journal, without a special time being set? I have no objection to its being set for immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion, the gentleman from Illinois moves that the bill lie on the table.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 107, noes 69.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-six gentlemen have arisen; not a sufficient number; the yeas and nays are refused; and the motion to lay the bill on the table prevails.

COEUR D'ALENE INDIAN RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 21458) authorizing sales of land within the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation to the Northern Idaho Insane Asylum and to the University of Idaho, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] asks unanimous consent to concur in the Senate amendments. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN THE NAVY.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 6252) to promote the administration of justice in the navy; and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up a conference report on the bill H. R. 6252, and asks unanimous consent that the statement of the House conferees be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill H. R. 6252 having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agrees to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the proposed amendment insert the following:

"That courts for the trial of enlisted men in the Navy and Marine Corps for minor offenses now triable by summary court-martial may be ordered by the commanding officer of a naval vessel, by the commandant of a navy-yard or station, by a commanding officer of marines, or by higher naval authority.

"SEC. 2. That such courts shall be known as 'deck courts,' and shall consist of one commissioned officer only, who, while serving in such capacity shall have power to administer oaths, to hear and determine cases, and to impose, in whole or in part, the punishments prescribed by article thirty of the Articles for the Government of the Navy: Provided, That in no case shall such courts adjudge discharge from the service or adjudge confinement or forfeiture of pay for a longer period than twenty days.

"SEC. 3. That any person in the navy under command of the officer by whose order a deck court is convened may be detailed to act as recorder thereof.

"SEC. 4. That the officer within whose command a deck court is sitting shall have full power as reviewing authority to remit or mitigate, but not to commute, any sentence imposed by such court; but no sentence of a deck court shall be carried into effect until it shall have been so approved or mitigated, and such officer shall have power to pardon any punishment such court may adjudge.

"SEC. 5. That the courts hereby authorized shall be governed in all details of their constitution, powers, and procedure, except as herein provided, by such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe.

"SEC. 6. That the records of the proceedings of the courts hereby authorized shall contain such matters only as are necessary to enable the reviewing authorities to act intelligently thereon, except that if the party accused demands it within thirty days after the decision of the deck court shall become known to him, the entire record, or so much as he desires, shall be sent to the reviewing authority. Such records, after action thereon by the convening authority, shall be forwarded directly to, and shall be filed in, the office of the Judge-Advocate-General of the Navy, where they shall be reviewed, and, when necessary, submitted to the Secretary of the Navy for his action.

"SEC. 7. That no person who objects thereto shall be brought to trial before a deck court. Where such objection is made by the person accused, trial shall be ordered by summary or by general court-martial, as may be appropriate.

"SEC. 8. That the courts authorized to impose the punishments prescribed by article thirty of the Articles for the Government of the Navy may adjudge either a part or the whole, as may be appropriate, of any one of the punishments therein enumerated: Provided, That the use of irons, single or double, is hereby abolished, except for the purpose of safe custody or when part of a sentence imposed by a general court-martial.

"SEC. 9. That the Secretary of the Navy may set aside the proceedings or remit or mitigate, in whole or in part, the sentence imposed by any naval court-martial convened by his order or by that of any officer of the Navy or Marine Corps.

"SEC. 10. That general courts-martial may be convened by the President, by the Secretary of the Navy, by the commander in chief of a fleet or squadron, and by the commanding officer of any naval station beyond the continental limits of the United States.

"SEC. 11. That a naval court-martial or court of inquiry shall have power to issue like process to compel witnesses to appear and testify which United States courts of criminal jurisdiction within the State, Territory, or District where such naval court shall be ordered to sit may lawfully issue.

"SEC. 12. That any person duly subpœnaed to appear as a witness before a general court-martial or court of inquiry of the Navy, who willfully neglects or refuses to appear, or refuses to qualify as a witness or to testify or produce documentary evidence which such person may have been legally subpœnaed to produce, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, for which such person shall be punished on information in the district court of the United States; and it shall be the duty of the United States district attorney, on the certification of the facts to him by such naval court, to file an information against and prosecute the person so offending, and the punishment of such person, on conviction, shall be a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment not to exceed six months, or both, at the discretion of the court: Provided, That this shall not apply to persons residing beyond the State, Territory, or District in which such naval court is held, and that the fees of such witness and his mileage at the rates provided for witnesses in the United States district court for said State, Territory, or District shall be duly paid or tendered said witness, such amounts to be paid by the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts out of the appropriation for compensation of witnesses: Provided further, That no witness shall be compelled to incriminate himself or to answer any question which may tend to incriminate or degrade him.

"SEC. 13. That persons confined in prisons in pursuance of the sentence of a naval court-martial shall, during such confinement, be allowed a reasonable sum, not to exceed three dollars per month, for necessary prison expenses, and shall upon discharge be furnished with suitable civilian clothing and paid a gratuity, not to exceed twenty-five dollars: Provided, That such allowances shall be made in amounts to be fixed by, and in the discretion of, the Secretary of the Navy, and only in cases where the prisoners so discharged would otherwise be unprovided with suitable clothing or without funds to meet their immediate demands.

"SEC. 14. That section sixteen hundred and twenty-four, article thirty-four, Revised Statutes of the United States, is hereby amended as follows: 'The proceedings of summary courts-martial shall be conducted with as much conciseness and precision as may be consistent with the ends of justice, and under such forms and rules as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President, and all such proecedings shall be transmitted in the usual mode to the Navy Department, where they shall be kept on file for a period of two years from date of trial, after which time they may be destroyed, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.'

"SEC. 15. That it shall be lawful for any civil officer having authority under the laws of the United States or of any State, Territory, or District to arrest offenders, to summarily arrest a deserter from the Navy or Marine Corps of the United States and deliver him into the custody of the naval authorities.

"SEC. 16. That the depositions of witnesses may be taken on reasonable notice to the opposite party, and when duly authenticated, may be put in evidence before naval courts, except in capital cases and cases where the punishment may be imprisonment or confinement for more than one year, as follows: First, depositions of civilian witnesses residing outside the State, Territory, or District in which a naval court is ordered to sit; second, depositions of persons in the naval or military service stationed or residing outside the State, Territory, or District in which a naval court is ordered to sit, or who are under orders to go outside of such State, Territory, or District; third, where such naval court is convened on board a vessel of the United States, or at a naval station not within any State, Territory, or District of the United States, the depositions of witnesses may be taken and used as herein provided whenever such witnesses reside or are stationed at such a distance from the place where said naval court is ordered to sit, or are about to go to such a distance as, in the judgment of the convening authority, would render it impracticable to secure their personal attendance.

"SEC. 17. That all sentences of summary courts-martial may be carried into effect upon the approval of the senior officer present, and all sentences of deck courts may be carried into effect upon approval of the convening authority or his successor in office.

"SEC. 18. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed."

ERNEST W. ROBERTS,
A. F. DAWSON,
L. P. PADGETT,
Managers on part of the House.
GEO. C. PERKINS,
J. H. GALLINGER,
B. R. TILLMAN,
Managers on part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 6252) to promote the administration of justice in the navy, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and submitted in the accompanying conference report on the amendment of the Senate, namely:

The House in receding from its disagreement to the Senate amendment to H. R. 6252 and agreeing to the same with an amendment has the effect of adopting the House bill with amendments and four additional sections, which were sections of the Senate amendment with amendments. Section 12 of H. R. 6252 is stricken out, and section 12 of the Senate amendment, with amendments, is inserted in lieu thereof. Section 2 of the House bill is amended so that the limit of confinement, or forfeiture of pay, is raised from fifteen to twenty days.

Sections 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, and 14 of the House bill remain the same.

The effect of striking out section 12 of the House bill and inserting section 12 of the Senate amendment with amendments is to provide a penalty of a fine not to exceed $500, or imprisonment not to exceed six months, or both, at the discretion of the court in cases where civilian witnesses are subpœnaed to appear and refuse to do so or refuse to qualify as witnesses. This section also provides for the payment of mileage and witness fees by the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, and provides further that no witness shall be compelled to incriminate or degrade himself.

Section 15, which was section 10 of the Senate amendment, provides for the arrest of a deserter from the Navy or Marine Corps by any civil officer having authority under the laws of the United States or of any State, Territory, or District to arrest offenders.

Section 16, which was section 13 of the Senate amendment, provides for the taking of depositions on reasonable notice to the opposite party, which may be put in evidence in cases not capital and in cases where the punishment may be a period of imprisonment or confinement for one year or less.

Section 17, which was section 7 of the Senate amendment, provides that all sentences of summary courts-martial may be carried into effect upon the approval of the senior officer present, and all sentences of deck courts may be carried into effect upon approval of the convening authority or his successor in office.

Section 18, which was section 14 of the Senate amendment, provides for the repeal of acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith.

ERNEST W. ROBERTS,
A. F. DAWSON,
L. P. PADGETT,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 27053).

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill, with Mr. FOSTER of Vermont in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of insects affecting citrus fruits, including the white fly, orange thrips, and for carrying on investigations of the hydrocyanic-acid gas process, $16,500.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill whether, in his opinion, that language is broad enough to include what is known as "orange-tree blight?"

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, orange-tree blight is a disease of the orange tree, and is not caused by any insect. My understanding is that it is a disease which they believe to be due to poor nutrition. Therefore any action that may be taken looking toward the eradication of it would properly come under the Bureau of Plant Industry and not under the Bureau of Entomology. And I may say for the information of the gentleman that the committee believe the amount of the appropriation carried in the bill to enable the Bureau of Plant Industry to carry on its studies along the line about which he inquires is ample for that purpose.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am not able to say myself whether it is an insect that causes this disease known as "orange-tree blight" or not; but if the gentleman thinks there is provision in the bill which will cover the investigation into that pest, whatever it may be, I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. SCOTT. I have no hesitation in giving the gentleman from Florida that assurance.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the maintenance of the Montana National Bison Range and other reservations for mammals and birds, $7,000.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the provision in lines 21, 22, and 23, on page 32.

Mr. SCOTT. If the gentleman will make the point of order instead of reserving it, we will take the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MONDELL. My thought was, Mr. Chairman, that if there is no objection to reserving a point of order, I would suggest an amendment. I have no objection to the provision with an amendment, but if the amendment is not accepted I shall feel it my duty to insist on the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. I would be glad to hear the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not desire to waive the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Let the amendment be read for information.

Mr. MACON. Did the gentleman from Wyoming reserve a point of order?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MACON. I will reserve a point of order on the whole proposition.

Mr. MONDELL. I desire to have the amendment read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the word "dollars," in line 23, the following:
"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the maintenance of any bird or game preserve established by executive order since June 28, 1906."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that for a considerable number of years past what are called "bird preserves" have been created in considerable numbers by executive order. It is not claimed that there is any specific authorization for creating such bird preserves. In my opinion there is no warrant of law for it. It seems to me the House ought to understand what is being done in this way. Prior to June 28, 1906, certain public lands, consisting of small, outlying islands, had been reserved by executive order. The Committee on the Public Lands reported a bill authorizing the protection of birds on these islands. But in reporting the bill a provision which it originally contained and which authorized the creation of such preserves was stricken out. It was freely admitted that there was no law authorizing the creation of these preserves, and that it was extremely doubtful if there was any authority for their creation, but that having been designated, there ought to be some means for their protection. The plea which prevailed was that they were few in number, small, swampy, uninhabitable islands in remote sections, and that Congress having declined to sanction the creation of these preserves when the question was before it, no more would be established.

Since that time there have been some 26 of these bird preserves created in various portions of the country by executive order.

Now, if the Executive is to continue to create these bird preserves—and, in my opinion, the Executive is not so authorized, and Congress has no power to grant such authority—if this practice is to continue, there is no telling how many bird preserves we may have or how much of the territory of the Union these federal bird preserves may ultimately cover. If the Executive may create 26 preserves in various States, he can create 2,600. Evidently this bureau proposes to go abroad over the land and create bird preserves without authority of law on which and over which it is proposed to enforce federal statutes, and by so doing to set aside the laws of the States within which the preserves are located.

My attention was called last fall to the fact that one of these preserves had been established in the State I represent, and in a statement given to the chairman of the committee by the bureau official a short time ago it was stated that this particular preserve was only 50 feet wide and 9 miles in circumference. In other words, the bureau imagine that they have in the State of Wyoming a sort of doughnut preserve 50 feet in width and 9 miles in circumference, a federal atoll within whose lagoon are the calm waters of the "twilight zone" of jurisdiction, and outside of which roll the waves of state control and sovereignty. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the fact is that these gentlemen who claim that there is executive authority to go within sovereign States to establish bird preserves do not even know the area of the preserves that have been established, and so they refer to this as being a reserve 50 feet wide, 3 miles from outside to outside, and 9 miles around.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What is a bird preserve?

Mr. MONDELL. It is a certain unconstitutional thing attempted to be created by executive action where there is no executive authority. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. According to that we have had innumerable bird preserves within the last seven years.

Mr. MONDELL. We have had a good many.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. One of the preserves is Loch Katrine, in the gentleman's own State?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it not true that that was created by sentiment at the request of the people in your own State?

Mr. MONDELL. It is very true. If the gentleman will wait, I will come to that and show how it was done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that I may continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that he may continue for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I will answer the question of the gentleman from North Dakota. Simply because some gentleman desires to have a private duck pond, within which he can hunt by consent of the Secretary of the Interior and within which no one else can hunt without danger of being dragged to a federal court 500 miles away and fined $500 and imprisoned for six months for shooting a duck or taking or breaking some snipe eggs, it does not necessarily follow that it is right, that it is proper, or that it is constitutional or legal that it should be done, and the fact that the gentlemen who were favorable to it were near and dear friends of mine does not alter the situation at all, except to add to my regret that I feel it my duty to call attention to these matters. The fact is that this Loch Katrine preserve covers over 5,000 acres. It is not any such a doughnut reserve as they imagine down here in the department. They do not understand the language used by the Interior Department when it refers to all of the lands within a meander survey and then in addition thereto 50 feet around the borders of the meander survey. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to know how far the Executive is going in this exercise of executive power in excess of executive authority. The Supreme Court of the United States in a number of cases has very clearly stated the fact that the States are sovereign in the control of game within their borders. This was decided in the case of Greer versus Connecticut and in the case of Race Horse versus Ward and a number of other cases. Beyond that, if there was any authority for federal control of game or birds in a State, there is no law authorizing the reservation of land for such purposes, and in the absence of specific authorization to that effect the Executive has no such authority. That has been very clearly set out in many decisions of the Supreme Court, and I desire to print in the RECORD some correspondence which I had with Mr. Palmer, of this bureau, with regard to the establishment of this preserve and of like preserves.

Mr. Chairman, as indicating how recklessly and carelessly these executive orders are issued and promulgated, I desire to call attention to the fact that the so-called "Loch Katrine Reserve" is not even on public land. It is on private land. The land had been granted under the right-of-way act to a company constructing a great irrigation enterprise, and that right of way is permanent, a perpetual easement; it is their property; it is taxable; it belongs to them; and it is in no sense public lands. So that not only has the Executive exceeded his authority in all these cases by attempting to establish bird preserves and by prohibiting the taking of birds, even though they may be taken in accordance with the laws of the States, but in this particular instance there has been an attempt to make a bird preserve of private lands.

Mr. Chairman, the correspondence I have referred to and which I shall print in the RECORD is as follows:

LOCH-KATRINE BIRD RESERVATION.

[No. 961.]

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

It is hereby ordered that all of the lands embraced within the meander survey of a reservoir site located in what is commonly known as the "Oregon Basin," embracing 5,500 acres, more or less, in section 5, township 51 north, range 100 west, and sections 19, 20, 21, 22, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, and 34, township 52 north, range 100 west of the sixth principal meridian, Wyoming, together with a strip of land 50 feet wide adjoining said meander survey on the outside and surrounding said reservoir site, as the said reservoir site appears upon the map of the Shoshone River Canal, on file in the General Land Office, approved March 13, 1903, and as the same is shown by the broken line upon the diagram hereto attached and made a part of this order, are hereby reserved, subject to valid existing rights, and set aside for the use of the Department of Agriculture as a preserve and breeding ground for native birds. The taking or destruction of birds' eggs and nests, and the taking or killing of any species of native birds for any purpose whatever, except under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Department of Agriculture, is prohibited, and warning is expressly given to all persons not to commit any of the acts hereby enjoined. This reserve to be known as the "Loch-Katrine Reservation."

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, October 26, 1908.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF BIOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, D. C., January 5, 1909.

Hon. F. W. MONDELL,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your letter of January 2, I inclose herewith another copy of Executive Order No. 961, establishing the Loch-Katrine Reservation in Wyoming.

In reply to your inquiry concerning the authority for the establishment of the reservation, I beg to say that these bird refuges, like other federal reserves established by executive order, are simply reservations of public land for public use. They differ in purpose, though not in principle, from reservations established for military purposes, naval stations, light-house sites, sea-otter reserves, reindeer stations, and other public uses. So far as I am aware, no specific act exists providing for the establishment of such reservations. They have been created by authority of the President in accordance with a practice which dates back to the earliest history of the Government and which has been repeatedly approved by Congress and sustained by decisions of the Supreme Court. Among the decisions bearing on this point may be cited Wolcott v. Des Moines Co. (5 Wall., 688), Grisar v. McDowell (6 Wall., 363), and Wolsey v. Chapman (101 U. S., 755).

In Grisar v. McDowell, involving the reservation of a tract of land in the city of San Francisco for military purposes, the Supreme Court declared:

"From an early period in the history of the Government it has been the practice of the President to order, from time to time, as the exigencies of the public service required, parcels of land belonging to the United States to be reserved from sale and set apart for public uses.

"The authority of the President in this respect is recognized in numerous acts of Congress. Thus in the preemption act of May 29, 1830, * * * in the preemption act of September 4, 1841, * * * the act of March 3, 1853, providing for the survey of the public lands in California. * * *

"The action of the President in making the reservations in question was indirectly approved by the legislation of Congress in appropriating moneys for the construction of fortifications and other public works upon them (p. 381)."

This question is fully discussed in an opinion of the Attorney-General submitted to the Secretary of the Interior regarding the Southern Pacific Railroad grant (16 Op. Atty. Gen., 87), and more recently in an opinion submitted by the Assistant Attorney-General to the Secretary of the Interior on June 17, 1890, regarding reservations in Alaska.

I may add that Congress has indirectly approved the establishment of these bird reservations in the act of June 28, 1906, "To protect birds and their eggs in game and bird preserves," by prohibiting the capture of birds or the taking of eggs "on any lands of the United States which have been set apart or reserved as breeding grounds for birds by any law, proclamation, or executive order." (34 Stat., 536.)

Respectfully,

T. S. PALMER,
In Charge of Game Preservation.

JANUARY 26, 1909.

Mr. T. S. PALMER,
In Charge of Game Preservation,
Bureau of Biological Survey, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of January 5, in reply to a request contained in my letter of January 2, in which I made inquiry concerning the authority for the establishment of the Loch-Katrine Reservation, and I note that you say that "these bird refuges, like other federal reserves established by executive order, are simply reservations of public land for public use." You state further that "they differ in purpose, though not in principle, from reservations established for military purposes, naval stations, light-house sites, sea-otter reserves, reindeer stations, and other public uses." You also state that so far as you are aware "no specific act exists providing for the establishment of such reservations," but that "they have been created by authority of the President in accordance with a practice which dates back to the earliest history of the Government and which has been repeatedly approved by Congress and sustained by decisions of the Supreme Court."

I note that in the closing paragraph of your letter you say:

"I may add that Congress has indirectly approved the establishment of these bird reservations in the act of June 28, 1906, 'To protect birds and their eggs in game and bird preserves.'"

I have very carefully considered the statements contained in your letter, have read the decisions to which you refer, as well as the act of Congress, title of which you quote, and I must say that I am utterly unable to agree with your conclusions as to executive authority touching the matters referred to, nor do I find support for the views you express in any of the authorities to which you refer.

Before entering on a discussion of the question as to the limitations of executive authority so far as it pertains to public lands, I desire to call your attention to the fact that the lands described in Executive Order No. 961, known as the "Loch-Katrine Reservation," are not public lands, and therefore could not be lawfully reserved by the President for any purpose whatever, even though the President had authority to create such reservations on public lands.

The lands described in the above-mentioned order are, as stated in the order, a part of the right of way of the Shoshone River Canal, approved March 13, 1903. This right of way is a congressional grant, and the lands embraced within it have been definitely determined by the approval of a map of the same, and the title is vested in the owners of the Shoshone River Canal and subject to taxation and control, as any other land in private ownership in the State of Wyoming.

Assuming for the sake of argument that the Executive has authority to establish reservations of this kind on public lands, surely no one will contend that any authority is vested in the Executive to create a public reservation on private land. If such an act as this were valid, then all the rights of way of all of the railroads in all of the public-land States could be made bird refuges or game preserves, for those rights of way were granted under statutes similar in all essential particulars to that under which the right of way in question was granted.

I desire, however, to emphatically protest against the theory that the President, or anyone else, has authority to reserve public lands as bird or game refuges or as bird or game preserves, or for any such like purpose, and the decisions cited certainly do not warrant the view that the President has such authority.

The case of Wolcott v. Des Moines Co. (5 Wall., 688) relates to reservations made by executive authority in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress. The Congress had, in 1846, granted to the Territory of Iowa, for the purpose of aid in the improvement of navigation on the Des Moines River, alternate sections of the public lands in a strip of 5 miles in width on each side of the Des Moines River. The only question at issue was whether a certain tract of land, designated by executive authority in pursuance of law, was a portion of the land granted by the act of Congress for the purpose of enabling the Territory to aid in the improvement of the Des Moines River.

To hold that this decision offers the slightest excuse for the executive act now under discussion is, it occurs to me, a most extraordinary torturing of the plain intent and effect of the decision.

The extract from the decision in Grisar v. McDowell (6 Wall., 363), quoted by you in your letter, has, I realize, been repeatedly used as an excuse for the claim of executive authority to withdraw lands, but will certainly bear no such construction as that now placed upon it, for unquestionably in using the term "for public uses" the court had in mind public uses of the character of that for which the tract in question in the case before the court was reserved, to wit, for military purposes.

No one has ever denied the right of the Executive to reserve land required for military purposes, for light-houses, or the like. In this case the question was, Did the Executive have the authority to set aside land for the military use of the Government?

The integrity of the Nation, the lives of its citizens, may depend upon the reservation of land for military and light-house purposes. They are clearly public purposes, such as the court had in mind when it passed upon this case involving the title to a military reservation, but it has been held by high authority that the authority of the Executive to withdraw land even for military purposes is a limited one, as was very clearly pointed out by Secretary Lamar in the case of the Fort Boise Reservation (6 L. D., 16), in which a reservation was made by the War Department of more than the 640 acres authorized by the act of Congress of February 14, 1853.

The case of Wolsey v. Chapman (101 U. S., 755), to which you refer, is another case relating to the Des Moines River grant, and the reservations made under that grant were clearly made by authority of Congress. The only question at issue was as to whether the lands in controversy were a part of the grant. The most strained and extravagant interpretation of this decision can not by any possibility torture it into a justification of executive withdrawals or reservations confessedly not based on any act of Congress.

I have examined with care the opinion of the Attorney-General submitted to the Secretary of the Interior regarding the Southern Pacific Railroad grant (16 Op. Atty. Gen., 87), to which you refer. I find that the opinion relates to a grant to the Southern Pacific Railroad made by Congress. The question in controversy was whether the Secretary of the Interior had erred in withdrawing certain lands as being part of the grant. There is nothing whatever in the case touching the right or authority of anyone to withdraw lands without definite and specific authority of law. The Attorney-General calls attention to the fact that the Secretary of the Interior may, in certain cases, be in doubt "whether a greater or less amount (of land) should be withdrawn in order to protect the grants or comply with other legislation of the United States." There is no claim that this reservation in question is made with a view of complying with legislation of the United States.

I can not refrain from expressing surprise at the rather extraordinary statement in the last paragraph of your letter to the effect "I may add that Congress has indirectly approved the establishment of these bird reservations in the act of June 28, 1906," by prohibiting the capture of birds or taking of eggs "on any lands of the United States which have been set apart or reserved as breeding grounds for birds by any law, proclamation, or executive order."

I happen to be well acquainted with the history of the legislation in question, and instead of being held by the executive departments as approving directly or indirectly anything that may have been done prior to the passage of the act, it should have been accepted by the executive departments as clearly indicating the determination of Congress not to authorize the creation of any such reserves.

The first section of the bill as introduced by Mr. Lacy was as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person to hunt, trap, capture, willfully disturb, or kill any bird of any kind whatever, or take the eggs of such birds on any lands of the United States which have already been or may hereafter be set apart or reserved as game preserves or breeding grounds for birds by any law, proclamation, or executive order, except under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of Agriculture."

It will be noted that this bill, had it become a law as introduced, would have authorized the reservation of lands as bird and game preserves, but as the bill became a law, all of that portion which I have italicized and which would have authorized the reservation in question was stricken out.

As a member of the committee that reported the bill I recall very clearly the discussion in the committee on the subject, and how earnestly Mr. Lacy, chairman of the committee, plead for the passage of the bill, and how, after it was amended by striking out all that portion which would authorize the reservation of lands for the purpose contemplated, the bill was only reported on the earnest plea of Mr. Lacy that there were only six reservations, the names, location, and extent of which were given, which it would affect, all of which were small islands, the largest containing about 28 acres. As stated by Mr. Lacy in his report, "All these islands are small in size, low, swampy, or rocky, and of no value for agricultural purposes."

It was admitted that these refuges had been established without authority of law, and that therefore there was no way of protecting the birds upon them, but on the plea that they were small, rocky, and uninhabitable, and on the distant coasts of the United States, the bill was finally reported out of the committee in the belief that while it would make it possible to protect the birds on the small outlying islands referred to it would also serve as notice to the executive departments that Congress would not authorize the setting aside of further lands for these purposes, as is clearly indicated in the last paragraph of the report on the bill, in which Mr. Lacy stated that the matter of providing for other reservations was under consideration by Congress in several bills.

Had the members of the committee reporting the bill to Congress had any idea that the view expressed in your letter would be held by the executive departments, it is safe to say that the bill would never have been reported, much less passed. Clearly the act will not bear the strained construction you now place upon it, but that construction is certainly a splendid object lesson to legislators to be careful not to seem to condone executive action, in excess of authority, lest it be warped into an excuse for further unlawful acts.

There is one feature of this matter which your department seems to have entirely overlooked in the search of authorities in the hope of finding decisions which would warrant the action which has been taken, and that is, that the Supreme Court of the United States had decided that the Federal Government has no authority over or right to regulate the taking of game within a State. This doctrine does not rest on any strained or fantastic interpretation of decisions, but has been clearly laid down in two cases by the Supreme Court.

First. In the case of Greer v. Connecticut (161 U. S., 519), in which the question of the control of the State over the game within its borders was elaborately discussed, the court said, referring to the power of regulating the taking of game: "For the purpose of exercising this power, the State, as held by this court in Martin v. Waddell (16 Pet., 410), represents its people, and the ownership is that of the people in their united sovereignty." The court then goes on to quote with approval a decision of the supreme court of California to the effect that "the wild game within a State belongs to the people in their collective sovereign capacity," and also a decision by the supreme court of Minnesota to the effect that ownership of game is in the State in its sovereign capacity as the representative of its people in common.

In the case of Ward v. Race Horse (163 U. S., 505), a case in which the question at issue was as to whether the United States had authority by treaty to authorize the taking of game by Indians from a region which subsequent to the ratification of the treaty was included within the boundaries of a State, in violation of the state game laws, the court held emphatically that the Federal Government had no such authority; that the State was sovereign and absolute in its control over the game within its borders. Among other things the court said: "The power of a State to regulate and control the taking of game can not be questioned."

The court rejected the argument that the treaty conferred the right to hunt "when the United States had called into being a sovereign State, a necessary incident of whose authority was the complete power to regulate the killing of game within its borders." After citing the fact that the act which admitted Wyoming into the Union expressly declared that the State was admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, the court referred to the claim that the Federal Government has the right to regulate the taking of game within the State as irreconcilably in conflict with the power of the State.

I most earnestly urge your careful consideration of these decisions, which are voluminous, exhaustive, definite, and controlling, and make it clear that the executive order in question is in direct conflict with the decisions of the Supreme Court above cited, and an attempted invasion of the rights of the State, inasmuch as it expressly enjoins, warns against, and attempts to prohibit acts which are entirely legal and lawful under the state law.

In conclusion, I desire to dissent most emphatically from the views expressed in your letter and to register my protest against the order in question, or any like orders, as being without authority of law, beyond and in excess of executive authority, in violation of the rights of the States and their citizens, and in direct conflict with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Very respectfully, yours, F. W. MONDELL.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. It is the understanding of the Chair that a point of order is pending.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] make the point of order?

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to be heard on the point of order before that is passed upon, but I understand that the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] would like to take the floor, and I will waive my right in his interest, because I prefer to close the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to know whether the point of order has been made.

Mr. MONDELL. I reserved the point of order pending the submission of this amendment, if it is accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, the gentleman from Arkansas also reserves the point of order.

Mr. MACON. I reserved a point of order on the whole proposition.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to state that I have no interest in this matter other than this: There are those in this country who are interested in bird life. There are a number of these reserves, or "preserves," as my friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] calls them, and I can not see why we should have any objection to the Government protecting these birds. This is a provision allowing, I believe, some $7,000 for the maintenance not only of these bird preserves, but also for the maintenance of the Montana National Bison Range.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There are a good many of us interested in this, interested in bird life, and we would like to see everything done to preserve and protect it, if the Federal Government can provide for it, if the Federal Government has the constitutional authority to do it. Can the gentleman point out to us whence that authority is derived, what part of the Constitution, or how?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to do that. It has been done in the past. I have only five minutes' time. Appropriation has been made for the maintenance of these bird preserves and these bison ranges heretofore, and I see no reason why we should at this particular time say that no further appropriations shall be made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One other question. Have we ever heretofore made any provision for bird preserves, or for bison preserves, except upon the public domain? Have we ever undertaken to do anything of that sort on private property?

Mr. GRONNA. In reply to the gentleman from Mississippi I wish to ask him if he means if Congress has made any such provisions?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I mean any Congress.

Mr. GRONNA. Well, it has been done, I will say in reply to the gentleman, by executive order. In the year 1901 a personal investigation was made in my State, and there was one reserve established, which is known as the "Stump Lake bird reservation."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that upon the public domain or off of it?

Mr. GRONNA. There are no public lands there. It is in a lake; it is in a body of water. There are four little islands in that body of water, containing less than 30 acres; these islands are government lands, and the Government has ever since 1901 cared for as much as it possibly could with the limited appropriations that we have given them. They have tried to make it a haven of refuge for birds.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. GRONNA. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. MONDELL. Why did not the people of the locality, who are the people interested, or the people of the State, do their duty in that regard and take care of those birds instead of calling upon the Federal Government?

Mr. GRONNA. In reply to the gentleman I will say that the conditions are exactly the same in my State as they are in his; that is, it is being neglected by the people of the State.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, that is not true in my State; I insist it is not, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. GRONNA. We have been a State for more than twenty years, and not until 1901 was there such a bird reservation preserved as the one to which I refer. I say to the gentlemen of this House that I shall not try to argue the point of order made against this paragraph, as the chairman of the committee, I understand, intends to do that; but I believe where we find small islands and they are not fit for anything else except for a haven of refuge for birds, we should allow the Government, or this particular bureau, to have an appropriation sufficient to enable them to look after those birds.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRONNA. I will be very glad to do so.

Mr. MACON. What kind of birds is it proposed to preserve?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the gentleman that we have on these islands birds that are nesting there, waterfowl particularly.

Mr. MACON. What are they good for?

Mr. GRONNA. We have pintail, teal, shovelers, and mallard ducks, white-winged scoters, and white pelicans.

Mr. MACON. Does the gentleman want the Government to go into the business of raising ducks, geese, and things of that sort?

Mr. GRONNA. Not at all; we are simply asking for an appropriation for some one to guard these islands so that these birds shall not be disturbed.

Mr. MACON. Another question. I notice that it is proposed to preserve mammals. What kind of mammals are there up there?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized, as I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GRONNA. I shall be very glad to answer a question.

Mr. MACON. I notice here some mammals that you want to preserve there. What are mammals, and of what use will they be to the Government?

Mr. GRONNA. So far as I know, there are no mammals on the islands. The species of birds we have I have mentioned. We have also the white pelican——

Mr. MACON. Are these mammals birds?

Mr. GRONNA. We have on those particular islands birds that are found nowhere else in the United States, I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas. We have the white-winged scoter that is not found anywhere else in the interior of this country.

Mr. MACON. But I want to know about the mammals.

Mr. GRONNA. I am not discussing or referring to mammals.

Mr. MACON. But I want to know about them.

Mr. GRONNA. I am talking about birds.

Mr. MACON. I have understood they are something like rats, gophers, or something of that kind.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Or 'possum. [Laughter.]

Mr. MACON. Oh, no——

Mr. GRONNA. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Arkansas that if there are any mammals there of any value we will be very much pleased to preserve them.

Mr. MACON. But what are they good for?

Mr. GRONNA. I say we have none that I know of.

Mr. MACON. What are they good for, or what would they be good for if they were there. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas that my reply to the gentleman was this, that if there are any mammals of any value we would desire to preserve them.

Mr. MACON. I am trying to get at what they are good for, but it seems that the gentleman can not inform me.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Chairman, in central and east central North Dakota during the spring and summer are found large numbers of nesting waterfowl—shore birds, gulls, terns, pelicans, and other birds. In 1901 a personal investigation of this region was made by several naturalists, who found birds and their young in numbers far beyond their expectation, and indicated by their reports the advantages that would accrue by preserving this region as a breeding ground. The desirability of some such action was emphasized by the fact that there was danger that market hunters if not checked would soon ravage the section, destroying the birds in large numbers and driving away the survivors to safer nesting grounds.

At the request of public-spirited citizens of the State, who desired to conserve this valuable bird life as far as possible, two of the lakes apparently furnishing the most attractive conditions for nesting were set aside as bird reservations by executive order. These reservations consist of several small islands entirely unfit for agriculture, but furnishing ideal conditions for the nesting of the birds, particularly waterfowl. These reservations are known as "Stump Lake Reservation," in Nelson County, and "Chase Lake Reservation," in Stutsman County.

Stump Lake Reservation, a few miles south of Lakota and east of Devils Lake, was established March 9, 1905. It consists of four small rocky and sandy islands, with a total area of less than 30 acres.

SPECIES PROTECTED.

These islands form the nesting ground of large numbers of waterfowl, particularly pintail, teal, shovelers, and mallard ducks. The region is notable as the only nesting ground of the white-winged scoter thus far discovered in the United States. Canada geese, lesser scaup ducks, and gadwall breed on the reservation. Beside these birds, gulls, terns, cormorants, spotted sandpipers, and several species of land birds nest on the islands. The reservation is much frequented by migrating birds that stop in their flight in spring and autumn on their way to and from their nesting grounds in the North. It thus forms a haven of refuge and a point of attraction for migratory birds in this part of the State. The first season after the reservation was established reports showed a large increase in certain species over the number produced in previous years. It was also reported that ducks had already found the reservation a refuge when hard pressed by hunters in the surrounding region.

Public sentiment seems to be entirely favorable to these reservations. Attention was first called to the desirability of creating them by public-spirited citizens in North Dakota, and since they have been established little or no objection has been made to them, but, on the contrary, residents in the neighborhood have evinced a deep interest in their welfare. Some idea of the interest in Stump Lake Reservation may be obtained from the fact that last summer when the warden had permitted a naturalist to go on the reservation to photograph the birds, he received almost immediately notices from three different sources that some one was trespassing on the reservation.

Chase Lake Reservation comprises a small island and a marshy peninsula in Chase Lake, Stutsman County, south central North Dakota. The area is not definitely known. This reservation, established on August 28, 1908, was first brought to the attention of the Department of Agriculture by residents of the county and was created at their urgent request. It is too soon as yet to report any definite results of the protection accorded the birds, but there is no doubt that it will have a most beneficial effect in preventing the destruction and increasing the abundance of certain species which frequent it.

Chase Lake is the breeding place of Canada geese, several species of ducks and shore birds, gulls, terns, and a colony of white pelicans. Like Stump Lake Reservation, it also serves as a resting place for many other kinds of birds during migration.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MACON. Out of courtesy to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], I reserve the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I do not know much about the reservation provided for in this bill, in Montana or elsewhere, nor am I particularly interested in the birds or mammals that exist there. But I am somewhat interested, Mr. Chairman, and I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Agricultural Committee to an apparent omission in this bill for the preservation of certain mammals that have recently come to public notice, much more than heretofore. I allude, of course, Mr. Chairman, to the now distinguished Georgia opossum. It occurs to me that as that animal has now achieved rather a national reputation and is to take the place of the Teddy bear, and we know that its qualities, at least, are very different in many particulars from the Teddy bear; and while it may smile and show its teeth as often as the Teddy bear, it is much more cunning and much more of an animal for food purposes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. How is the opossum related to the 'possum?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. It is the same thing, I understand.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Both from Ireland.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. My attention was directed to it recently by what occurred in my own State between some of the colored citizens there, for whom, years ago, Congress had a peculiar solicitude. I hold in my hand an account contained in the Macon Telegraph of a conversation between certain citizens in my city upon this subject; and as it has given them considerable anxiety and solicitude, I call attention to what was said on that occasion. It appears that during the dinner hour, some of the negro employees, having seen various accounts of the fact that the President-elect was to come to Macon to the state fair, became exercised about the opossum. I read the article referred to:

"Er seed in de paper whar de President gwineter kim ter Macon in de timer de fair, an' dey gwineter git 'possum supper so he kin eat 'possum; dat wot dey say," said Hog-Eye Joe.

"Ef dat so, den hit good-bye possum, kase dey say Mister Taf' bigg'n one er dese baler cottons. Ef dat mans gitter tas'er 'possum an' taters an' some gravy anner kagger dis ni-bear, hit sho good-bye Isum, an' we po' niggers woont gitter smeller any mo' 'possum; tell yer dat," observed Bill.

"Wot mek yer say he er big mans? Cose he big mans. He de President. Mos' any mans er big mans wot President. He kaint eat no mo'n me jiss kase he President. Wat de matter wid yer, mans?" said Sam.

"Mister Taf' he weigh mo'n dis baler cottons er tell yer! Dat wot dey tell me. W'en dey fix upper dish er 'possum for 'im hit gotter be er mouty big 'possum, letter lone de taters an' de gravy. Dey tells me dat mans eater whole chick'n fur he brekfus, sides er lotter sossidge an' ham an' aigs, an' battercakes anner potter coffee. Dat wot dey tells me; er dunno nuffin' 'bout hit merse'f." Bill was always careful of his statements.

"Who pay fur dat kiner brekfus? He mus' sho be er rich mans ter gitter brekfus lak dat. Wot he do fur er livin'? He mus' be one er dese money loaners," said Sam.

"Dat ainter bodrin me lak eatin' all de 'possums w'en he comes. Yer know he ainter comin' ber hese'f, an' he gwineter come widder gre't big crowder dem Noo Yawk w'ite mans, an' hit gwineter tek er sight er 'possums ter go roun'. Mer li'l' gal wot go ter school she read me in de paper whar Mister Taf' he come ter Atlanty an' dey sot out ter git all de 'possums fur he dinner, an' dey tell me, cose er dunno ef hit true, dat dey gits all de 'possums fum all roun' Alibenny an' Valdoster, an' dey lef none fur seed. Dat bein' de case, dar aint no mo' 'possums," said Bill.

"Dunno wot dey wants ter feed de mans on 'possums fur no how. W'ite mans got no business ter eat 'possum. De good Lawd med de 'possum fur de nigger. W'enner w'ite mans cotch er 'possum ber de tail de 'possum show he teefes; nigger cotch er 'possum ber de tail er 'possum lay he haid down on de groun lak he wanter say, hyeer er iz! Lettum gi' de mans er baiter sossidge an' chitlin's an' hog-haid souse an' cracklin' braid an' shorty cake. Dat wot de President oughter eat any how." This from Knocknee Jim.

"W'en yer say dat mans er comin'?" asks one.

"Timer de fair. Dey dun sont de invite. Gotter picshur uvver 'possum on de invite hangin' ber de tail fummer 'simmon tree, jiss ready ter drap in de bag," said Bill, whose daughter reads the papers to him.

"Er tells yer wot we do, niggers, fo dat time. Evvy one er us go 'possum huntin' an' cotch all de 'possums roun' Macon an' pen 'em up an' den we gitter haid uvvum. Dis yer bisness 'bout de President eatin' all de 'possums doan soot dis chile." This was merely a suggestion.

"Dat hit! Yer sho tol' de trufe dat time. Jiss you alls lay low an' say nuffin', an' wese kin sho 'em dat de nigger sho gwineter git he 'possum w'en de time comes. Who dis Mister Taf' any way? Dat li'l' gal er mines she read dat he doan lak de nigger no how. Dem Publikins dun say dey ti'ed er messin' wid de nigger. Dey say dey save money ber letnum go, kase dey used ter haveter buy 'em. Dey didn't buy dis chick'n! Nevvy did seed de color er dey money. Doan yer all go tell hit, an' w'en wese git thoo wid dem 'possums dar woont be er 'possum in de whole er Bibb County."

So, Mr. Chairman, I desire to suggest that we ought to do something for the purpose of preserving the 'possum.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself to the point of order. I take it for granted that whether this section will be determined to be obnoxious to the rule or not depends on the view the Chair will take as to whether the bison reservation and the other reservations for mammals and birds have been created in accordance with the law. I think there will be no question as to the bison range, because the Chair will remember that in the appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture last year a sum was carried for the purchase of this range and to provide for having it fenced. The matter must therefore rest upon the legality of the reservations for mammals and birds, and upon that question your Committee on Agriculture is not in doubt. We investigated the matter rather carefully, and I have placed before the committee the small map in front of the Clerk's desk, upon which the red disks indicate where the reserves exist. I have a list of these which I might give if any gentleman so desired, but it is perhaps enough to say that there are 25 of them, located in 7 States, as follows: Florida, 10; Louisiana, 4; North Dakota, 2; Michigan, 2; Wyoming, 1; Oregon, 3, and Washington, 3. Those reservations are unsurveyed for the most part, and their exact area is not known. Most of them are not more than 4 or 5 acres in extent, and are merely mud flats, sand bars, swamps, or islands.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman please tell me how those reservations were created? Were they public lands or private lands?

Mr. SCOTT. I am coming to that, if the gentleman will allow me. With the exception of the reserves at Klamath Lake and Malheur Lake, these reservations are simply of swamp lands or barren islands and are of no agricultural value. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has said that the Loch Katrine Reserve includes a large reservoir comprising something over 5,000 acres.

The information which I have from the Chief of the Bureau of Biology is that this reservation comprises only a strip 50 feet in width surrounding that reservoir, the intention being to reserve the reedy margin of the lake, I presume, to protect the eggs and young of nesting birds.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where does the public get the land?

Mr. SCOTT. It was a part of the public domain. In that connection I am reminded of what the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] said. His statement was that Loch Katrine is private property. The information had heretofore is that the land intended to be included in the Loch Katrine Reservation is public property. If it is not public property, it seems to me that those who own it would have their remedy in the courts, if they desire to contest the occupation of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order having been made, the Chair would like to have the gentleman from Kansas address himself to the question whether they are authorized by law.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I was diverted by the questions of the gentleman from Tennessee, and shall direct myself now to the question of order. My recollection is that these bird reservations, against which the attack is made by the gentleman from Wyoming, were created by executive order under what has for a long time been considered to be ample authority. In the case of Grisar v. McDowell (6 Wall., 363), involving the reservation of a tract of land in the city of San Francisco for military purposes, the Supreme Court declared:

From an early period in the history of the Government it has been the practice of the President to order, from time to time, as the exigencies of the public service required, parcels of land belonging to the United States to be reserved from sale and set apart for public uses.

The Chair will note the phrase "public uses"—a very broad term.

In the case of United States v. Payne (8 Fed., 883), the United States district court, western district of Arkansas, held:

The President of the United States can, by proclamation or executive order, reserve a part of the public domain for a specific lawful purpose.

There certainly can be no question that a reservation for the protection of birds and mammals is a lawful purpose.

Furthermore, in the same decision, the court says:

No set form of words or phrases need be used to set aside a reservation. It is enough if there are sufficient words to indicate the purpose of the power that acts to show that it intended to act in a given case.

As early as 1832 the Supreme Court of the United States, in United States v. McDowell (7 Peters), held:

A practical knowledge of any one of the great departments of the Government must convince every person that the head of a department, in the distribution of its duties and responsibilities, is often compelled to exercise his discretion; he is limited in the exercise of his powers by the law, but it does not follow that he must show a statutory provision for everything he does.

I claim, therefore, that founded upon these opinions there is sufficient ground to authorize the creation of these reservations. I might cite a good many other authorities, but I do not care to take up the time of the Chair and the House to do so. It seems clear to me, Mr. Chairman, that under the practice of the Government for many years the President has been fully warranted in setting aside these reservations, and I desire particularly to call the attention of the Chair to the act of Congress for the protection of birds upon reservations. It was clearly intended to give the assent of Congress to the President in such action as he might take in respect to the setting apart of any portion of the public domain for this purpose.

Section 7, to which I particularly direct the attention of the Chair, is as follows:

That it shall be unlawful for any person to hunt, trap, capture, willfully disturb, or kill any bird of any kind whatever or take the eggs of such birds on any land of the United States which have been set apart or reserved as breeding grounds for birds by any law, proclamation, or executive order, except under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Evidently Congress in passing that statute anticipated that such reservations might be set aside by executive order, and undoubtedly if such action upon the part of the Executive would be illegal, Congress would not by implication have authorized it, as it clearly did in that statute.

Mr. MONDELL. Whenever we assume from what——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to interrogate the gentleman from Kansas: Did the Chair understand the gentleman from Kansas not to claim that there was any statute authorizing this reservation?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not claim that there is any statute authorizing reservations for birds and mammals aside from the bison reservation in Montana. I think there is specific statutory authority for that.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it is not claimed by the department that there is any specific authority for the creation of these reservations.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman means "statutory" authority. The department does claim that it has authority.

Mr. MONDELL. The department twists some decisions in a very extraordinary way in order to find authority for the creation of these reserves. Now, Mr. Chairman, first, I want to say a word in regard to the statute that has been referred to by the gentleman from Kansas. I feel somewhat guilty in regard to that statute, for I feel that if I and others who felt as I did had not given our assent it would never have been reported.

Bills proposing to grant authority for the creation of game and bird reserves were before our committee for I do not know how many Congresses. The committee was almost unanimously opposed to them; but finally, after a great deal of importuning on the part of certain gentlemen, some of those on the committee who were opposed to the entire legislation agreed that so far as those little outlying reservations, small in size and few in number, theretofore created without authority of law by executive proclamation or order were concerned, we would not oppose legislation making it possible to protect birds on them, believing that the language of the amended bill, amended so as to strike out all authority to create reservations, confined the legislation to the protection of the small reservations that had been created prior to that time.

I think the passage of that seemingly innocent little bill will be an exceedingly good lesson to certain Members of this House not to allow anything to pass, if it can be prevented, that by any possibility can be tortured by a department or bureau of the Government into a grant of authority not intended to be given.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on the question of decisions in regard to the setting aside of lands for these purposes, the gentleman has referred to the case of Grisar versus McDowell, a case in which the question was, Whether the pueblo of San Francisco had the right to hold lands under a Spanish statute, which had been reserved by the United States for military purposes. Nobody has ever denied the right of the Executive to reserve public lands for military purposes, for light-house purposes, for custom-houses. Those are public purposes. They are purposes which the Supreme Court had in view when it said "public purposes;" and there is not a decision that has been quoted or referred to that does not have reference to these acknowledged public purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And not only public purposes, but federal purposes.

Mr. MONDELL. Federal purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the purposes for which the Federal Government can take them are always federal purposes.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman allow me to give him the exact language of the opinion which I read:

> From an early period in the history of the Government it has been the practice of the President to order, from time to time, as the exigencies of the public service required, parcels of land belonging to the United States to be reserved from sale and set apart for public uses.

Not for military purposes or light-houses, but in the broadest sense—for public uses.

Mr. MONDELL. I desire again to call the attention of the House to the fact that this was a case where land had been reserved for military purposes; and up to within a few years ago it was never claimed by anyone that the executive authority was wide enough to authorize the reservation of land for anything except public federal purposes, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has so well stated.

The Supreme Court in that case had before it the fact that for military purposes, for purposes necessary to the preservation of the life of the Nation possibly, some land had been set aside. There can not be any question of the authority of the Executive to set aside lands for that purpose. But the courts have held that even in exercising this authority with regard to land for military purposes, the Executive has not the authority to withdraw vast areas, but must only withdraw such areas as are reasonably necessary. And in a decision rendered by Mr. Lamar some years ago, when he was Secretary of the Interior, he very clearly called attention to the class of cases within which the authority of the Executive should be exercised, to wit, public purposes necessary for the maintenance of the Federal Government.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the Chair for a moment to the fact that this can not be a public purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. MONDELL. I desire just for a moment, if the Chair will permit me, to call attention to the fact that this can not by any stretch of the imagination be considered a public purpose; for the Supreme Court in a number of cases has held, particularly in the case of Greer against Connecticut, and Race Horse versus Ward, that the power of the State over game, and controlling the taking and disposition of game, is sovereign; that even the treaty-making power of the Government can not interfere with it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have not examined these authorities except as I have had an opportunity to read them in that brief, but the second case cited by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture refers to the setting aside by executive order of lands for lawful purposes; not public purposes, but the word "lawful" is used. I do not know what the facts were, but the word "lawful" is distinct entirely from the word "public."

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that some of the other cases that have been referred to are cases where there was a congressional grant of land for a certain purpose. Two of the cases that have been referred to are cases connected with the Des Moines River grant in Iowa, where Congress granted land for a certain purpose, and the question was as to whether the lands reserved were the lands granted. That was the only question raised, and the court very properly said that the Secretary, in exercising his authority, in doing his duty, in carrying out the law of Congress, and selecting such lands as he believed came within the grant was reserving land lawfully. No one will deny that. The fact would develop later as to whether or not all the lands reserved were within the limits of the grant, but so long as the Secretary acted in pursuance of law the decision was that his action was legal.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad to.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask the gentleman whether he thinks the appropriation made by Congress for the extermination of the gypsy moth and other noxious insects is within the federal power?

Mr. MONDELL. Inasmuch as New England has suffered very much from the devastation of these moths, and as I feel kindly to New England, I am not disposed to raise that question.

Mr. PERKINS. If that is within the federal power, why is it not within the federal power to preserve the birds that are useful in killing the insects?

Mr. MONDELL. Because the gypsy moth is not a game bird, and the Supreme Court has held in a number of cases that state jurisdiction over game was absolute.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman is mistaken in the object of the law. It is not to preserve game birds, but birds useful in killing noxious insects.

Mr. MACON. There is nothing here in this bill to indicate that.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER of Vermont). The Chair thinks the point of order well taken as the gentleman from Kansas is unable to point out any statute authorizing the provision. The Chair will quote from the brief sent to the desk by the gentleman from Kansas:

> An excellent illustration of the exercise of Executive discretion in the execution of the public-land laws is found in the action of the President of the United States, who, by his proclamation of August 19, 1893, in providing for the opening of the land within the Cherokee outlet and Tonkawa and Pawnee reserves, reserved section 13 in each township for university, agricultural colleges, and normal schools, subject to the action of Congress.

The Chair does not suppose that the gentleman from Kansas would claim for a moment that that action by the Executive would be sufficient authorization, under the rules of this House, for an appropriation for a university, agricultural college, or normal school.

As has been indicated, the Executive may make a reservation for a court-house, but that would not be sufficient authorization, under the rule of the House, for an appropriation. So it seems to the Chair that, in the absence of any statute or any authorization within the meaning of the rule of the House, the point of order must be sustained; and the point of order being made to the whole paragraph, the whole paragraph must go out. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> After line 20, page 32, insert as a separate paragraph:
> "For the maintenance of the Montana national bison range, $3,000."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman might add after that, so as to get at what he really wants, the words "and other reserves in public lands only." That would cut off the reservations which have been made to private lands and get at what the gentleman wants.

Mr. SCOTT. I think, under the ruling of the Chair, the amendment stated by the gentleman from Tennessee would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think the birds on other public reservations ought to be protected as well as on the bison range, and also the animals. If it is important to protect them in the bison range, it is important to protect them in other places.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: After the last word in the paragraph just adopted add the words "and other reservations in public lands only."

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Against that I make a point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is just as much in the power of government to preserve the game and animals on the public lands of the Government as it is to order the marshal to go into the custom-houses around over the country and with guns kill these little English sparrows that have become a nuisance. Now, with the indulgence of the committee, I want to state that I remember the history of the Lacey bird law. Undoubtedly a number of Members of this House remember it. I was talking to Major Lacey a few days ago, and he tells me that he hears beneficial results from the law from all over the country, and particularly down on the Atlantic coast, where the little bird that formerly was a great scavenger in killing insects was once very numerous and got to be very scarce. Major Lacey had just come from there, it seems, and since the passage of that law the people inform him that those birds have come back by thousands.

Gentlemen will remember the great speech by the late lamented Amos Cummings, of New York, on the passage of that Lacey law. He said that when he first came here the forests were full of birds, and at that time—when he spoke—they were all gone. Why, no one can tell. I do not know why, but they have returned in a measure since that law was passed. Mr. Chairman, as stated by the gentleman from Montana a few minutes ago, the Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly held—that wild game within a State belongs to the people in their collective sovereign capacity. It is not the subject of private ownership, except in so far as the people may elect to make it so; and they may, if they see fit, absolutely prohibit the taking of it, or traffic or commerce in it, if it is deemed for the protection or preservation of the public good.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does the gentleman think that the Federal Government can invade a State where the Supreme Court has already decided that the State has absolute jurisdiction over the control of game within the State and establish laws in conflict with the State simply because the land happens to be public land?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of course I will have to answer that very pregnant question; no. But the Federal Government has the right absolutely to control its public lands, its public places, its court-houses and court-house yards, and the gentleman knows that is good law.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am not speaking of that sort of thing.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But I am. That is what I have in mind. I believe I used the language, "other reservations in public lands only." The gentleman knows as well as I that a Territory or a State has no control over federal lands, any more than it has control over the District of Columbia. These lands belong to the Federal Government, and it is the duty of the Government—in those places, those federal places—to protect the animals and the birds and the inhabitants thereof, if you please, as much so as it is the duty of the State to protect the birds and the animals and the people within the limits of the State.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will my friend allow me to correct the statement he has made?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. All right.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Territory, and I speak of my own, has very strict game laws, very strictly enforced. Does the gentleman mean to say that the local authorities of the Territories can not punish a man for killing an animal on a game preserve or a forest reservation?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No, no; but the Territory is federal property, and if the Federal Government arms the local authorities with power to do this——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. They have armed the local authorities with all power in the matter.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then, why do not they do so with the bison range?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The bison range is another one of these very executive orders that out of consideration has been left in this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If there is no law for the national bison range, then that ought not to be in this bill; but there is no point of order made against it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no law for the bison range except previous appropriation bills. If the point of order had been made, it would have gone out.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to explain myself a little further, and I move to strike out the last word. I simply want to take care of the game on the federal lands and the public domain. If the gentlemen who live out west, who have practically the public domain, and who have to look after its preservation, do not want it done, it is immaterial to me; and if they object to it, I will withdraw the amendment. Does the gentleman object to it?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not think the amendment ought to go on in that form.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Was the point of order made against this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It was reserved, as the Chair understood.

Mr. SCOTT. I hope the Chair will rule on the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule on the point of order, and sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating the food habits of North American birds and mammals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry, including experiments and demonstrations in destroying noxious animals, $25,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. MACON. I make the point of order against that provision, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order to the paragraph.

Mr. SCOTT. May I ask the gentleman to reserve his point of order for a few minutes?

Mr. MACON. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I concede that there is no authority for this paragraph except preceding appropriation acts, but the same point of order could be made against a very large part of the paragraphs carried in this entire bill. Everything contained under the Bureau of Biological Survey could be stricken out under a strict construction of the rule, unless the Chair will take the view which the chairman of the committee expressed and urged last year, that the organic act creating the department expressly authorizing, as it does, the Secretary of Agriculture to acquire and diffuse among the people information relating to agriculture in the broadest sense of that term is sufficient to authorize this appropriation.

There can be no question, Mr. Chairman, of the great value to agriculture of the information acquired by the studies conducted through this Bureau of Biological Survey. The chief of the bureau appearing before the committee called our attention to case after case in which through the recommendations of his bureau large areas of country had been freed from noxious animals, and with very great resulting advantage to the people. Our attention was called to the fact that in 1907 there was a plague of gophers came upon the Truckee-Carson reclamation project in Nevada, the gophers attacking the irrigation ditches and other works of that project in such a way as to cause a break in those ditches almost every twenty-four hours.

The cost of repair, of course, varied from a few dollars to several dollars each. A couple of expert men were sent from this bureau to investigate the subject, and as a result of their investigation the gophers were exterminated, so that the head engineer of the project reports that, whereas in 1907 he had a break almost every day to repair, which cost very large sums of money, during the year 1908 there had not been a single material break from the gopher work in all the system of canals and ditches. So, if the Chair required it, or I thought it necessary to take his time, I could call his attention to numerous other cases in which information acquired by this bureau has been of great advantage to the agriculture interests of the country. I can not believe, however, it is necessary to protract the argument, and therefore I ask for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The organic law establishing the Department of Agriculture provided, among other things, the following:

There shall be at the seat of Government a Department of Agriculture, the general design and duties of which shall be to acquire and to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, just there permit me to say that I did not remember the exact wording of that statute, and for that reason I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, not for the purpose of making a speech, but in order to ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD some resolutions on the subject of immigration from the Third Annual Convention of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

THIRD ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE FARMERS' EDUCATIONAL AND COOPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA, FORT WORTH, TEX., SEPTEMBER 3, 1908.

Whereas foreign immigration is being advocated for southern and western farming communities, a United States Immigration Commission is investigating the subject, and a federal bureau is being established for the purpose of distributing and diverting foreigners; and

Whereas the present flagrant lax enforcement of existing immigration laws and the urgent need of additional restrictive legislation will soon result in the agricultural sections in the South and West being made a dumping ground for undesirable southeast European and Asiatic populations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, in its third annual convention at Fort Worth, Tex., this 3d day of September, 1909, and representing over 2,000,000 farmers, hereby adopts the immigration resolutions passed last January at the annual rally in Memphis calling for federal and state legislation abolishing immigration bureaus and substantially excluding the present alien influx of cheap labor from southeastern Europe and western Asia, and urge upon federal officials the vigorous enforcement of all immigration laws in order to properly protect the country's welfare and to preserve its institutions, safeguard its citizenship, and perserve its Angle-Saxon civilization for posterity; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each Member of Congress by the chairman of the national legislative committee, with the request that they be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and to the Immigration Commission, with the request that they be incorporated in its report; and be it further

Resolved, That the state presidents and lecturers emphasize this one question, with a view to having members take it up in conference and by letter with their Congressmen and Senators.

IN THE NATIONAL CONVENTION, FARMERS' EDUCATIONAL AND COOPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA, AT MEMPHIS, TENN., JANUARY 8, 1908.

Whereas it is proposed to distribute and divert foreign immigrants to the agricultural districts of the South and West; and

Whereas a federal bureau has been established and state immigration bureaus are proposed for that purpose; and

Whereas we are unalterably opposed to such and to the present enormous alien influx, as detrimental to the best interests of the farming communities and the welfare of our whole country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, in national convention assembled, at Memphis, Tenn., this 8th day of January, 1908, and representing 2,000,000 farmers, urge upon Congress the immediate abolition of the federal bureau of distribution and the speedy enactment of laws substantially excluding the present enormous alien influx, by means of an increased head tax, a money requirement, the illiteracy test, and other measures; and that we call upon our public, and especially our city, officials to prevent the agricultural sections from becoming a dumping ground for foreign immigrants.

The Clerk read as follows:

For biological investigations, including the relations, habits, geographic distribution, and migrations of animals and plants, and the preparation of maps of the life and crop zones, $18,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. A few moments ago I alluded to the Lacey bird law, and some weeks ago I stated that the Supreme Court had upheld that law. I now want to cite the leading authority which did so; the case of the People ex rel. Hill v. Hesterberg, 184 New York Reports, which case was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States and affirmed on November 2, 1908, upholding the game law of the State of New York. The Federal Supreme Court, however, did not pass on the Lacey law. The New York court did.

Now, gentlemen will remember, when we had up the Humphreys liquor amendment and the penal code some weeks ago, I alluded to the "Lacey law" as a precedent for the passage of that amendment, and in that debate I said the Congress had passed the "Lacey law" and the courts had upheld it. I did not have at that time the authorities at hand. It is pertinent to cite some of these authorities, so that at least my good faith as to my offhand statement, that the courts had upheld the law, will stand borne out.

In the New York case the question was fairly put as to what the Lacey law was, its validity, use, meaning, and so forth, and the court of appeals, in a very able opinion of Judge Cullen for the whole court, upheld the law, and, amongst other things, the court well said, and I call this specially to the attention of the committee:

By the Lacey Act Congress intended to aid the States in the enforcement of their game laws.

And the Attorney-General of the United States (22 Op.) also passed upon the law as it related to a certain question propounded by some department. There are several federal decisions where it was generally considered, but it was directly raised in the New York case. And, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as this law will be very pertinent authority in the discussion of the liquor question which we will have here in a few days, I shall ask unanimous consent to print several extracts from this New York opinion in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The opinion of the court is as follows:

Cullen, Ch. J. The relators were arrested on warrants charging them with a violation of the game law. They sought discharge from their arrest by writs of habeas corpus. On the return of those writs they were remanded to custody. On appeal to the appellate division the orders of the special term were reversed and the relators discharged from custody. From those orders these appeals are taken. As the affidavits on which the warrants for the arrest of the relators were issued differ materially in their statements of facts, we will first consider the one made in the Hill case. The affidavit avers that on the 3d day of March said John Hill did have in his possession in the Clarendon Hotel, in the Borough of Brooklyn, one dead body of a bird known as a "golden plover," and one dead body of a fowl commonly called a "grouse;" that, as the affiant was informed and believed, the said plover and grouse were taken without the State of New York, to wit, from England and Russia, and thence brought into the Borough of Brooklyn.

The forest, fish, and game law (chap. 20, Laws, 1900; amended chaps. 194 and 317, Laws, 1902; chap. 588, Laws, 1904), by sections 106 and 108 enacts that grouse shall not be taken or possessed from January 1 to October 31, nor plover from January 1 to July 15. By section 140 of said act grouse is defined to include rough grouse, partridge, and every member of the grouse family. By section 141 the inhibition enacted by the other sections of the statute is made to apply to fish, game, or flesh coming from without the State, as well as to that taken within the State. By section 119 anyone violating the provisions of the statute hereinbefore recited is guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to a fine of $25 for each bird taken or possessed in violation thereof. The relator was in possession of the birds during the prohibited period, and hence was guilty of a misdemeanor unless he is relieved from the penalties prescribed by the statute by the fact that the birds were imported from foreign countries. We shall not discuss at any length the claim of the relator that the statute contravenes the constitution of this State as depriving the relator of his property without due process of law. That question has been settled adversely to that claim by the decisions of this court in Phelps v. Racey (60 N. Y., 10) and People v. Bootman (180 N. Y., 1), in which it was held within the power of the legislature, in order to effect the preservation of game within the State, to enact not only a close season, during which the possession of such game should be unlawful, but also to enact that the possession in the State during such season of game taken without the State should be equally unlawful.

The Phelps case is cited by the Supreme Court of the United States in Greer v. Connecticut (161 U. S., 519), in which the validity of a statute of that State was upheld, not only on the ground that the original ownership of wild game is in the State, but on the further ground that the preservation of such game is a valid exercise of the police powers of the State. To the argument that the exclusion of foreign game in no way tends to the preservation of domestic game, it is sufficient to say that substantially the uniform belief of legislatures and people is to the contrary, and that both in England and many of the States in this country legislation prohibiting the possession of foreign game during the close season has been upheld as being necessary to the protection of domestic game, on the ground that without such inhibition or restriction any law for the protection of domestic game could be successfully evaded. (Whitehead v. Smithers, L. R. (2 C. P. Div.), 553; ex parte Maier, 103 Cal., 476; Magner v. People, 97 Ill., 320; Missouri v. Randolph, 1 Mo. App., 151; Stevens v. State, 89 Md., 669; Roth v. State, 51 Ohio St., 209; Commonwealth v. Savage, 155 Mass., 278.) The case of Phelps v. Racey (supra), has never been overruled by this court. In the opinion delivered in People v. Buffalo Fish Company (164 N. Y., 93), Judge O'Brien took two positions: First, that the exclusion of fish taken without the State was invalid as interfering with he power of Congress to regulate foreign and interstate commerce. Second, that under a proper construction of the game law as it then stood, the statute was applicable only to fish taken within the State.

It was this second ground alone which received the assent of the majority of the judges and on which the decision in the case proceeded. This ground has been removed by the amendment of the statute already cited, which makes it applicable to game taken without the State. People v. Bootman (supra) reaffirms the doctrine of Phelps v. Racey and the validity of the legislation before us, at least so far as the constitution of the State is involved. In that case, while we affirmed the decision below because the offenses for which the defendant was prosecuted were committed before the amendment to the statute, we felt called upon to express our opinion on the whole subject, so that the citizen might not be misled by the opinion rendered in the court below and thus unwittingly subject himself to severe penalties. If, as is claimed, the views then expressed by the court on the subject before us were obiter and not necessary to the decision made, it is sufficient to say that we adhere to them, not on the ground of stare decisis, but because they command our approval.

LACEY BIRD LAW.

Therefore, if the act of Congress, passed May 25, 1900, commonly termed the "Lacey Act," empowered the States to enact the legislation before us, it is unnecessary for us to enter into any examination of the question of interference with foreign and interstate commerce, discussed, but not decided, in People v. Buffalo Fish Company.

That Congress can authorize an exercise of the police power by a State which without such authority would be an unconstitutional interference with commerce, has been expressly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in Matter of Rahrer. (140 U. S., 545).

THE QUESTION.

The question before us is merely the interpretation of the Lacey Act, which the learned counsel for the respondents contend applies solely to interstate shipments and not to importations from foreign countries. The act is entitled "An act to enlarge the powers of the Department of Agriculture, prohibit the transportation by interstate commerce of game killed in violation of local laws, and for other purposes."

The first section relates to the Department of Agriculture.

The second section prohibits the importation of any foreign wild animal or bird except under special permit from that department, providing that it shall not restrict the importation of natural-history specimens nor caged birds, such as domesticated canaries, parrots, and the like. It then forbids absolutely the importation of the mongoose, flying foxes, the English sparrow, and such other birds as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem injurious to the interest of agriculture or horticulture.

The third section forbids the delivery to a common carrier for shipment from one State to another of any wild animals or birds killed in the State in violation of its laws.

The fifth section deals with the transportation into any State of animals killed without the State. It is as follows: "That all dead bodies or parts thereof of any foreign game animals or game or song birds the importation of which is prohibited, or the dead bodies or parts thereof of any wild game animals or game or song birds transported into any State or Territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such animals or birds had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

"This act shall not prevent the importation, transportation, or sale of birds or bird plumage manufactured from the feathers of barnyard fowl." It is contended that the title of the statute tends to show that the operation of section 5 is confined to shipment from other States and not to importation from foreign countries. If the title of the act could limit its effect, which it can not (Potter's Dwarris on Statutes, p. 102), still this claim is without foundation.

The first two sections of the act deal with the Department of Agriculture, and the reference thereto in the title is appropriate.

The third and fourth sections deal with interstate transportation of game killed in violation of local laws, and the reference in the title "prohibit the transportation by interstate commerce of game killed in violation of local laws" is equally appropriate.

The fifth section, which is the one before us, deals with an entirely different matter—transportation into a State, not out of a State—and is embraced in the title of the statute only under the designation "and for other purposes." As to this subject, therefore, the title in no respect tends to limit the effect of the act. It is difficult to see any reason why Congress should have sought to discriminate between the bodies of game, song birds, or wild animals brought into a State from other States and those brought from foreign countries.

OBJECT OF LACEY LAW.

The object of the legislation was to enable the States by their local law to exercise a power over the subject of the preservation of game and song birds, which without that legislation they could not exert. Every consideration that led Congress to think it wise to confer on the State of New York, as well as on other States, power (which is practically that of prohibition during the close season, at least for the purposes of sale) over the importation of partridges from New Jersey, Pennsylvania, or Connecticut, is equally applicable to the importation of such birds from Canada. The obstacle to the successful enforcement of the game laws of the State would be as great in one case as the other, and as Canada borders on the United States for a distance of 3,000 miles the practical danger would be as great in one case as in the other, whatever it might be in the case of an importation from Europe. But it is said Congress permits the importation of foreign game and collects the duty thereon, and it can not have intended to allow property thus imported to be confiscated. The proposition that Congress allows the importation of foreign game is true only in a restricted sense.

By the Lacey Act Congress determined to aid the States in the enforcement of their game laws, but did not deem it wise to enact a game law of its own, and this for the very obvious reason that the game laws of the different States vary greatly, a variation justified in no small degree by varying climatic conditions. It would be unwise to entirely prohibit the importation of game into the country during a part of the year during which in some of the States the taking and consumption of such game is lawful. So Congress practically said to the citizen: We do not prohibit the importation of foreign game, but subject it to the local laws, and you must see to it, at your own risk, that you do not violate those laws. The term "transported" is used in the Wilson Act of Congress relative to intoxicating liquors (enacted August 8, 1890) as in the present act. Yet it seems incredible that Congress intended to suffer the State of Maine to seize liquor in original packages when brought from Massachusetts, but not when brought from Canada or Europe. The words of the section before us are sufficiently comprehensive to include all game brought into the State from whatever place, and we do not think it profitable to enter into a verbal analysis save in one respect. It is urged that the concluding sentence of the section, "This act shall not prevent the importation, transportation, or sale of birds or bird plumage manufactured from the feathers of barnyard fowl," excludes all birds from its operation. We think not. The qualification "manufactured from the feathers of barnyard fowl" applies as well to birds as to bird plumage. Birds mentioned in this sentence are plainly artificial birds, and so the Treasury Department of the United States has ruled.

The Clerk read as follows:

For general administrative expenses connected with the above-mentioned lines of work, including cooperation with other federal bureaus, departments, boards, and commissions on request from them, $15,000.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of getting some information as to whether or not this is not a new paragraph over the last year's appropriation bill.

Mr. SCOTT. No; it does not carry authority for any additional work. This is simply the paragraph in which the administrative expenses of the bureau are taken care of. It is worded a little differently from the language of last year's bill, merely to conform to the other parts of the bill.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Then, as I understand the gentleman, the agricultural appropriation bill passed at the last session of Congress carried an item for this same purpose?

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, undoubtedly; yes, sir.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I wish the gentleman would inform me, or the committee rather, what bureaus of the Government cooperate with the Agricultural Department in this kind of work.

Mr. SCOTT. The Bureau of Forestry carries on some cooperative work, and there is some cooperation in the matter of good roads with the Post-Office Department. Then, of course, the various bureaus of the department cooperate with and among one another.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I see that the paragraph under consideration also speaks of cooperation of commissions. What national commissions cooperate with the Agricultural Department in looking after such work as is referred to in this paragraph?

Mr. SCOTT. Since the gentleman from Indiana has called my attention to the wording, I should qualify what I said. I do not remember what the last act carried, but it did not carry that of commissioners. I can tell the gentleman, of course, the commissions with which this bureau has cooperated; but I do not know whether that is the information he desires or not.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes; I would like to know what commissions the department cooperated with that would bring this within the purview of the paragraph.

Mr. SCOTT. I think the commission for the conservation of natural resources had done part of this work, and my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Vermont, has called my attention, in further answer to the gentleman's question, to the statement of the chief of the bureau before the committee, to the effect that in addition to the Forestry Service, to which I have already alluded, he has cooperated with the Reclamation Service and the Commission on Public Health and the Marine Service and the Geographic and a number of other boards and bureaus.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, Division of Publications: One editor, who shall be chief of division, $3,000; 1 editor, who shall be assistant chief of division, $2,250; 1 chief clerk, $2,000; 1 associate editor, $2,000; 4 assistant editors, at $1,600 each; 2 assistant editors, at $1,400 each; 1 assistant in charge of indexing, $1,800; 1 indexer, $1,400; 1 assistant in charge of illustrations, $2,000; 1 draftsman or photographer, $1,500; 2 draftsmen or photographers, at $1,400 each; 1 draftsman or photographer, $1,200; 5 photographers, at $1,200 each; 1 assistant photographer, $840; 1 assistant in charge of document section, $2,250; 1 assistant in document section, $1,600; 1 foreman, miscellaneous distribution, $1,500; 1 foreman, farmers' bulletin distribution, $1,200; 2 forewomen, at $1,200 each; 1 clerk, class 2; 5 clerks, class 1; 10 clerks, at $1,000 each; 10 clerks, at $900 each; 25 clerks, at $840 each; 32 clerks, at $720 each; 1 chief folder, $1,000; 1 folder, $900; 3 folders, at $840 each; 1 skilled laborer, $900; 15 skilled laborers, at $840 each; 15 skilled laborers, at $780 each; 20 skilled laborers, at $720 each; 2 messengers, at $840 each; 4 messengers, at $720 each; 3 messengers, at $600 each; 2 messengers, at $480 each; 2 messengers, at $420 each; 2 messengers, at $360 each; 1 fireman, $720; 2 laborers, at $660 each; 1 laborer, $600; 3 charwomen, at $480 each; 4 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $173,320.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MACON. I desire to raise a point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman reserve or make the point of order?

Mr. MACON. I make the point of order, on page 34, line 25, to the word "two," extending to page 35, line 1, "hundred and fifty dollars," that being an increase of salary to the amount of $250.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inquire of the chairman of the committee as to whether this is an increase or not.

Mr. SCOTT. This is an increase, Mr. Chairman, and I do not care to resist the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MACON. Another point: On line 3, page 35, I make the point of order to the word "five," that being an increase of $100.

Mr. SCOTT. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SCOTT. The point of order having been sustained, I move to amend. I believe there is no amendment necessary to leave in the words "one assistant in charge of document section, at $2,000." As I understand, the point of order only went to the words "two hundred and fifty dollars." But in the case of one foreman of miscellaneous distribution, I move to amend by inserting the word "four" for the word stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 35, line 3, after the word "thousand," insert the word "four."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will informally rise to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate House joint resolution 247, relating to the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, making the 12th day of February, 1909, a legal holiday, and for other purposes, and the amendment thereto.

Also:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to furnish the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, a duplicate engrossed copy of the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 219) to accept the gift of Constitution Island, in the Hudson River, New York, the original having been lost.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 27970. An act to amend section 8 of the act approved May 28, 1908, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to navigation, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 16743) for the removal of the restrictions on alienation of lands of allottees of the Quapaw Agency, Okla., and the sale of all tribal lands, school, agency, or other buildings on any of the reservations within the jurisdiction of such agency, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CLAPP, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. PAYNTER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTH OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following request of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate House joint resolution 247, relating to the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, making the 12th day of February, 1909, a legal holiday, and for other purposes, with the amendments thereto.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the request of the Senate be acceded to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the request of the Senate be acceded to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman a question. Has this provision to do with the printing and distribution of Farmers' Bulletins?

Mr. SCOTT. It has to do with the distribution; not with the printing of them.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Here is the purpose of my inquiry. Heretofore, until last year, all the bulletins that were not used by a given time, the 1st of April, reverted to the Secretary of Agriculture. That rule has been revoked. I do not know when. But the law now is that they do not revert, and the result is that quite a number of Farmers' Bulletins filed with the Secretary lie there to the credit of Members who do not want them and never use them. Other Members who are very anxious to secure these bulletins in order that they may distribute them among their constituents, who want them and who are anxious for them, can not get them. Now, I want to know if it would be in order by amendment to this paragraph to go back to the old rule, so that these bulletins may revert to the Secretary and then be available for those Members who really want them and need them, instead of lying there entirely idle and entirely useless, to the credit of Members who have no desire for them and no need of them. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, my recollection is that the provision for the printing of the Farmers' Bulletins is carried in the sundry civil bill, and no doubt the change in the law to which the gentleman has called attention was made upon that bill. Therefore, the place to correct it would be upon that bill. I do not think it would be in order upon the agricultural appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total for Division of Publications, $206,320.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, on page 34, lines 16 and 17, I offer an amendment to strike out "eighteen hundred" and insert in lieu thereof "two thousand."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent to recur to that paragraph?

Mr. STANLEY. It is in the same paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. No; that paragraph has been passed.

Mr. STANLEY. Then I ask unanimous consent to recur.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, while I do not wish to deny to my colleague on the committee unanimous consent to recur to the paragraph, I shall be obliged to make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF STATISTICS.

Salaries, Bureau of Statistics: One statistician, who shall be chief of bureau, $4,000; 1 assistant statistician, who shall be assistant chief of bureau, $2,500; 1 chief clerk, $1,800; 6 clerks, class 4; 9 clerks, class 3; 12 clerks, class 2; 2 clerks, at $1,300 each; 16 clerks, class 1; 10 clerks, at $1,000 each; 6 clerks, at $900 each; 5 clerks, at $840 each; 10 clerks, at $720 each; 2 messengers, at $840 each; 1 messenger, $660; 1 messenger, $480; 1 laborer, $720; 1 laborer, $660; 1 charwoman, $540; 2 charwomen, at $360 each; in all, $104,360.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the increase of salary in line 7, page 37. The existing salary is $3,500. The increase here seems to be $500, making the salary $4,000—one statistician who shall be chief of bureau, $4,000.

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair inquire what the present salary is?

Mr. MACON. The present salary is $3,500.

Mr. SCOTT. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SCOTT. I offer an amendment restoring the present salary.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 37, line 7, in lieu of $4,000, stricken out on the point of order, insert $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, library, Department of Agriculture: One librarian, $2,000; 1 assistant librarian, $1,400; 2 clerks, class 1, one of whom shall be a translator, 2 cataloguers, at $1,200 each; 3 cataloguers, at $1,000 each; 2 clerks, at $1,000 each; 4 clerks, at $900 each; 1 clerk, $840; 1 messenger, $720; 1 messenger or laborer, $480; 1 charwoman, $480; in all, $19,320.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to correct an error in punctuation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 12, page 39, after the word "translator," strike out the comma and insert a semicolon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses, Department of Agriculture: For stationery, blank books, twine, paper, gum, dry goods, soap, brushes, brooms, mats, oils, paints, glass, lumber, hardware, ice, fuel, water and gas pipes, heating apparatus, furniture, carpets, and matting; for lights, freight, express charges, advertising, telegraphing, telephoning, postage, washing towels, and necessary repairs and improvements to buildings and heating apparatus; for rent in the District of Columbia; for the purchase, subsistence, and care of horses and the purchase and repair of harness and vehicles, for official purposes only; for the payment of duties on imported articles, and the Department of Agriculture's proportionate share of the expense of the dispatch agent in New York; for official traveling expenses; and for other miscellaneous supplies and expenses not otherwise provided for, and necessary for the practical and efficient work of the department, $80,000.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, and for that purpose I move to strike out the last word. On page 40, line 19, there is an item:

For the purchase, subsistence, and care of horses and the purchase and repair of harness and vehicles, for official purposes only.

How much of the amount of money appropriated in this paragraph is used for the purchase of official horses only?

Mr. SCOTT. I am unable to answer that question.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Can the gentleman approximate the amount?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not think I can even approximate it. I do not remember that our attention was called to that amount. It is well understood that the Secretary needs horses, and that many horses are necessary to carry on the work of the department here in Washington.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Is all the money appropriated in this paragraph for the purchase of horses to be used here in the city of Washington or the District of Columbia?

Mr. SCOTT. In the District of Columbia.

Mr. COX of Indiana. How many horses has the Agricultural Department here under its charge in the District of Columbia?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They have an experimental farm across the river in Virginia. Could none of those horses be bought out of this appropriation?

Mr. SCOTT. They could be bought out of this appropriation.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. But the gentleman said the District of Columbia.

Mr. SCOTT. Under the authority in this appropriation, I think they can purchase horses for the experimentation farm.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Can the gentleman tell us how many horses the Agricultural Department has in the city of Washington?

Mr. SCOTT. No; I confess that the committee did not inquire as to that matter.

Mr. COX of Indiana. The chairman can not give the committee the amount of money appropriated in the paragraph which will go for the purchase of horses to be used by the department?

Mr. SCOTT. I regret to say that I can not give the information. I may say to the gentleman that the committee makes a less careful inquiry into the contingent fund for the reason that it is under the personal direction of the Secretary, and we have learned that we can well trust his discretion and canny Scotch economy, and we feel at liberty to give him somewhat of a free hand.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Are the horses used by the Secretary of Agriculture and his assistants to ride back and forth with?

Mr. SCOTT. By the Secretary, not by his assistants. Most of the horses are used in doing the work of the department, apart from the use as carriage horses.

Mr. COX of Indiana. And only the Secretary of Agriculture himself has a carriage horse?

Mr. SCOTT. That is my understanding.

Mr. COX of Indiana. At the expense of the Government?

Mr. SCOTT. That is my understanding.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does the gentleman think his understanding is correct?

Mr. SCOTT. I think there is no question about that. The matter was thrashed out on the floor some years ago, and legislation was enacted which limited the use of carriages and carriage horses to the heads of departments.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What called my attention to it was an item in the newspaper to the effect that the Government was furnishing horses for different purposes for persons to ride to and from their homes and to and from the departments.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not think that is done as a matter of common practice. Perhaps the Secretary may send a subordinate from the department on an errand. The Secretary has occasionally accommodated members of the committee who were at the department by ordering a carriage to send them to their office, but as a matter of common practice I am quite sure nobody illegally uses the government carriages or horses.

Mr. COX of Indiana. If only the Secretary has the use of carriage horses, I will not enter any protest.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, for general expenses, $863,800.

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill, referring to this provision for the maintenance of agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaiian Islands, Porto Rico, and so forth, was any consideration given by the committee for an experiment station, or the demand for one, on the Canal Zone?

Mr. SCOTT. No; that matter was not brought to the attention of the committee, and no suggestion was made that such an experiment station was needed.

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. I would like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that when the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was down there recently the importance of this matter was called to their attention many times by those there in charge of the work on the zone. Attention was called to the fact that after the submersion of lands by the artificial lake there will be 200 square miles of arable land still remaining. It is probably quite as important—much more important, in fact—that some experiments should be made there as upon the island of Guam. The committee has moved in the right direction, but they have not gone far enough.

Moreover, the other day, in the bill to provide for the government on the Canal Zone, provision was made for leasing the lands there, and attention was called to the importance of leasing the agricultural lands. Colonel Goethals called the attention of the committee to the importance of the leasing of these lands. I do not know that it will be practicable to undertake to amend this bill to that effect now, but I wanted to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the matter.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is speaking of lands on the Canal Zone?

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The provision for the leasing of those lands was in the bill that we passed the other day.

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. Yes, I understand that; but I am talking about an experiment station.

Mr. MANN. Colonel Goethals, in charge of the leasing of the lands, said he thought it was perfectly useless to put an experiment station there.

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. On the other hand, I understand he said it was exceedingly desirable.

Mr. MANN. I do not doubt the gentleman's word at all, but in a recent hearing given before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, taken during the holidays, Colonel Goethals said that he did not think such a station was needed there at all.

Mr. SCOTT. I think, Mr. Chairman, and will say to the gentleman from Missouri, it would hardly be advisable to offer an amendment to that effect at this time. It is a subject the committee would be glad to consider in a proper way at some future time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Drainage investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the drainage of swamp and other wet lands and to prepare plans for the removal of surplus waters by drainage and for the preparation and illustration of reports and bulletins on drainage, including rent and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all necessary expenses, $81,160.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph for drainage investigation. May I ask the gentleman from Kansas what is the situation at present in regard to drainage investigation, and what is the purpose of this paragraph?

Mr. SCOTT. This paragraph, or language identical in effect, has been carried in the bill for a great many years, and under the authority granted thereby the department has carried on studies to develop the best methods of drainage of swamp lands, and the work has been done in connection with reclamation projects and irrigation work of various kinds, as well as in the humid parts of the country.

Mr. MANN. I realize the value of the work which the department has done in reference to the drainage investigation, but I do not quite realize yet the desirability of having the department undertake to drain the Everglades or the other large swamps of the country without the direct authorization of Congress.

Mr. SCOTT. There is no thought on the part of anybody connected with the department or on the part of any member of the committee that such work as the gentleman from Illinois suggests will be done by the department. We are watching that very carefully, and the utmost the department has ever done has been to suggest methods by which swamps could be drained most economically, and as a result of those suggestions a great deal of swamp land in various States has been drained; but I do not know of a single dollar that has been expended by the department in the actual work of drainage.

Mr. MANN. I know of more than one dollar that has been expended by the department with a view to presenting a plan to Congress for the drainage of the Everglades in Florida, and other large swamp areas in the same manner, and I do not think it is the business of the department to inaugurate schemes of that sort without the direct authorization of Congress.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not see how the department could carry out the instructions in this paragraph and obtain useful information without following it up to the extent of presenting a plan by which the drainage could be made.

Mr. MANN. The point I am trying to make now is to ascertain whether it is the purpose under this appropriation to employ experts to go and discuss and consider the question of draining the Everglades of Florida, as an instance. I have no animosity toward the Everglades over some other place, although that is probably the most conspicuous instance where theories might be worked out in reference to drainage. If this is really for farm drainage, or for the drainage of the ordinary lowlands in farming countries, there can be no objection to it.

Mr. LAMB. That is what it is for.

Mr. MANN. That is what the gentleman from Virginia says, but I happen to know the money has been diverted to other purposes.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Illinois is right in his intimation that the bureau does work further than the mere drainage of farm areas. Under the language in this paragraph authorizing the Secretary to report upon the drainage of swamp and other wet lands, and to prepare plans for the removal of surplus water by drainage, undoubtedly this bureau has presented plans for draining large areas of swamp lands, some of them belonging to States and some to private individuals and corporations, the idea being that when these lands have been drained, they become valuable for agricultural purposes.

Mr. MANN. Oh, that is true, and the idea being further openly advocated that the department shall go ahead and study out a scheme in order to obtain the authority from Congress to give part of the reclamation fund to use for the drainage of these swamp areas.

Mr. SCOTT. Does not the gentleman think we can take care of that proposition when it comes before us?

Mr. MANN. I have always been inclined to think that the best way to take care of a proposition is when it commences to poke its head into the door.

Mr. SCOTT. I am quite sure that the gentleman from Illinois would not attempt to interfere with the prosecution of very valuable and necessary work, merely through his anxiety that something might be done hereafter which he would not approve.

Mr. MANN. I do not approve of the efforts toward expending large sums of money studying how to drain the Everglades at present, unless Congress specifically authorizes it. I do not think it was ever contemplated by these appropriations in this manner to authorize anything of the sort, although undoubtedly it does authorize it.

Mr. SCOTT. This appropriation would not permit the expenditure of any very large sum of money, because the total amount carried is only $81,160.

Mr. MANN. Well, that would be a very large sum, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. SCOTT. But it must be used to carry forward a great deal of other work.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I would like, if I may be permitted a moment——

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has the floor.

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman.
